Will Profit by Reading it

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The handsome Premium, "Twice Around the World with Alexander, the Prince of Gospel Singers," came duly to hand, and I hasten to tell you I am delighted with it, and hope to profit greatly by reading it. I wish you continued success.
KINGSTON, ONT., CAN. MRS. CLARK HAMILTON.

This Elegant Book and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for one whole year (53 numbers), for $2. Sent all charges prepaid.

A Canadian's Appreciation

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Many thanks for the lovely Calendar and also the premium book, "Animal Stories." The book I consider worth two or three dollars, and you only charged me fifty cents for it. How you do it is a mystery to me. If THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was $5 instead of $1.50, we would take it still and get good value even at that. I have been taking it for about fifteen years and my mother took it before.
MONTREAL, CAN. J. A. MATHEWSON.

This Charming Book, our Sunshine Calendar and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, for only $2. All charges prepaid.

Likes the Red Letter Bible

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I received the Red Letter Bible to-day, all charges prepaid. Upon examination I find it as represented, if not better. It is the most convenient Bible I ever saw. Being small in size and the type so clear, enables one to read and handle it easily. The red lettering is helpful to any one in reading the Bible. The names of the books being printed in the corners instead of the centre of the leaves, enables one to locate a book more quickly and easily. May it enter into the homes of many.

An Octogenarian's Greeting

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I thank you most heartily for the beautiful 1908 Calendar. It is a highly appreciated gift. "Little Sunshine" is now shedding her good cheer and brightness in my bedroom, where my eyes first behold her on awakening. Though nearly fourscore and ten years old, I still delight in the winning ways of childhood. I also wish to thank you for the earnest wish that I may be richly blest through the coming year. May THE CHRISTIAN HERALD continue to prosper and may its noble efforts to bless mankind be crowned with success.

Good Wishes from an Astronomer

My Dear Dr. Klopsch: The package of books you sent me has come. I thank you very much for your kindness, and in the thanks my good wife and daughter heartily join. We shall esteem the books for the giver as well as their own beauty and merits. The Red Letter Bible is a masterpiece of printers' art. Again, I say, "Thank you, and may our Good Father bless you in your great work." I cannot close without expressing my appreciation of your great HERALD—for great it is, in the able manner in which it is conducted, aside from its greater merits of being a CHRISTIAN HERALD. Our home watches for its coming.

The Best of All Bibles

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The India-Paper Red Letter Bible received a few days ago, is the most compact and readable Bible I have ever seen. The workmanship is substantial and very neat. I consider the Bible worth the cost of my life subscription plus the $2.50 paid for the Bible. I worked twenty years at bookbinding and know good work when I see it.

Rashey Castle (at Top) Where 500 Christians Were Slain

Druse Women of Mr. Hermon

THE DRUSES OF MOUNT LEBANON

BY O. E. MOFFET

Pastor First Baptist Church, Streator, Ill.

RASHEY, or Rasheyet-el-Wade, is a Syrian town of 8,000 inhabitants. It is on the north slope of Mount Hermon, 4,000 feet above the sea. The snow-covered mountains rise 5,000 feet above the town.

While there I noticed a very peculiar people who kept themselves aloof from the Christian inhabitants. The men wore long cloaks made of one piece of cloth, "woven from the top throughout," and perhaps like that of our Saviour, for which the soldiers cast lots. They also wore a broad white turban. The women's headdress was a long white veil, held so as to expose but one eye when they met men. These people were Druses, descendants of the peculiar religious sect who incited the massacre of 1860, when 20,000 Christians, men, women and children, were cruelly butchered. An old man told me about those awful times when the Christians were hunted in the mountains like wild game. He pointed a trembling finger toward the castle which stood on a height and said:

"I watched from the mountain while 500 of my brethren were butchered up there. The Turkish government had said to us, 'Give up your arms and come into the castle and you shall be protected.' They obeyed the order; I ran away and hid. I saw the Druses come and take them from the castle, one by one, and slash their throats with cruel knives. Then I saw their bodies piled in a great heap where they festered in the sun, and I dared not go back and bury my kindred."

I became curious to know all about the Druses; but they guard the mysteries of their faith so well that few could tell me much about them. I was told of a native lady in a distant village, who had been initiated in all the secrets of the sect, and who might be induced to talk. I made a very difficult journey through the mountains to see her. This old lady had traveled extensively, and obtained a good English education while abroad. She belonged to one of the best families, and her neighbors told me she was rich. I will give her story as nearly as possible as she told it.

"The Druses originated in Egypt. The founder's name was Hakem, sometimes called the insane, and he was born in Cairo in 985 A.D. He was governor or caliph of Egypt, and cruel by nature. He murdered at one time 3,000 Christians, and his whole reign was characterized by persecutions, both of Christians and Jews. He claimed to be divine, and desired to be worshiped like Mohammed. He employed Ismail Darazi, his spiritual adviser, to introduce the doctrine.

"One day, this man appeared in the mosque of Cairo, and proclaimed Hakem an incarnation of deity. The doctrine was not well received. In spite of the guards, which the governor had placed in the mosque to protect his disciple, Ismail Darazi barely escaped with his life. He fled to Damascus and there made disciples. Later, he made his home at Mount Hermon, and the valley which runs down from Rashey to the Jordan still bears his name. To this mountain country, thousands of his followers made pilgrimages, and many remained to live near their great teacher.

"Hakem employed a second disciple named Hamze, sinated by his sister, and Hamze announced to his followers that Hakem had only gone into hiding to try their faith, and that he would return. His followers are still expecting his return.

"I was born a Druse," the lady continued. "No one but the descendants of the original disciples of Hakem can become members of this sect. My father was one of the great ones of our people. In our town, there was a small community of Christians, and we all lived on friendly terms. In childhood, I played with the girls from those Christian homes; and our hearts were knit together in love and friendship. You ask, were they present at my wedding? Why, no; I was not present at my own wedding, nor was my husband. Our ceremony is not like yours. A representative from each family arranges the business part. Then they meet together in the presence of friends and the priest, and talk, following a well-known ceremony, and this is the wedding. The father of the bride usually acts for her. He must have the daughter's consent; but usually when she is of marriageable age, the father says, 'The time has come when you should have a husband. Shall I choose for you?' And the daughter replies, 'Do so, father, for you are wiser than I.' After the ceremony, the bride is taken to the house of the groom, or to his father's house, where there is feasting and rejoicing, and the husband removes the veil. I was married when fifteen, and many of my friends were married younger. The men of our people have but one wife.

"The Druses are divided into three classes: the wise, middle-wise and foolish. Any man or woman of the sect may become a candidate for the wise or highest degree. A candidate must memorize all the hymns, prayers, principal doctrines and texts, by which one Druse may know another when they meet as strangers. Then there is a probationary period of one year, and if the high council of the church are satisfied, he or she is solemnly declared to be a wise one, and permitted to wear the white turban, the emblem of purity. The middle-wise are those who are not thought trustworthy enough to take part in the secret council, or who have not been able to complete the memory work. The foolish are Druses who drink, use tobacco, swear, wear jewelry, or otherwise misbehave, and some exemplary persons who, owing to business cares, or for other reasons, believe they have no time to devote to the study of the cult.

"A Druse will never turn a needy traveler from his door. Beggary is unknown among us. We are an educated people. All can read and write, and the purest Arabic spoken in the mountains is that of the Druses. They are better formed and have more regular features than the other mountaineers. We have fifteen thousand fighting men in the Hauran, and all together the Druses number one hundred and twenty thousand. Our a felt-maker, who appeared in Cairo teaching the new religion, but fared no better than his predecessor, and was obliged to flee. He came to Syria and identified himself with the disciples there; but so different was his teaching from that of Darazi, that a bitter dispute arose between the two. Darazi was ultimately put to death by his rival. About the same time Hakem was assassinated

A New Start in Life

TEXT—Gen. 1: 28
"And God blessed them"

IN the midst of the discussion which grows stronger and in some respects fiercer every day over the social and religious and political conditions of America, one great fact stands out more clearly and prominently than any other, and that is the fact that no one institution has so much real influence in shaping the thought, the conduct and the action of this nation as the institution known as the family.

In the very beginning of man's life upon earth the family took and held the most important place, and it holds it still. Therefore I would impress upon you at the beginning of these plain talks on the home life of the nation the fact that the home is a divine institution, established by divine purpose and with a divine end in view. God first made man in his own image and blessed the union of husband and wife. "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh" (Gen. 2: 24). The family of the race therefore started with the divine blessing resting upon it. Christianity accepts the rule then established of one husband and one wife. Any other social arrangement is condemned by what we call civilization. So far as this rule is established, it is in accordance with the divine beginning, but one point needs continual emphasis and repetition, and that is: in the formation of every family there should be this same recognition of the need of the divine presence.

Beginning of Family Life

There is no doubt that a great volume of evils from which civilization suffers, springs from the wrong beginning of the family life. The choice which a young man makes of a wife is determined in a vast number of instances simply by physical attractions, similarity of taste, or merely mutual comradeship. These things all have a proper place in what we call courtship. They are not to be ruled out by any means. They form a part, and a true part, of what is sometimes falsely called "falling in love"; but any marriage that does not take fundamental account also of true religious feeling and agreement is liable to result in disaster, and in every case is full of peril when certain crises arise. The records of the divorce court reveal the fact that in nearly every case where trouble has arisen between a man and his wife, there has been an absence on one side or both of a deep religious sentiment. No matter how strong an attachment there may be between the man and the woman in matters of taste or companionship or education, the strongest tie that ever binds two people together is their mutual belief in and love for a Supreme Being. In other words, religion, meaning by that the true love of God and man, is by far the most fundamental basis of married happiness or peace.

The number of homes which might be useful and contributory to the nation's welfare, but are practically useless, is due to a failure to recognize this great and fundamental principle. The early Christian writers, like Paul, warned the church members against marriages where either man or woman was not a Christian. It was declared to be, as it always is, a dangerous thing for a believer to be yoked to an unbeliever. I think it is impossible to over-emphasize the necessity of this principle from the very start in every marital union of two lives. Given, to start with, two people who are healthy in mind and body, who have companionable instincts, who have been reared in the same educational atmosphere, who love the same kind of books, music or art, who are interested in the same common struggles of life, and have, besides, a common faith in a great and loving God, and a Christian faith in a personal and world Redeemer, and you have the basis for a happy married life.

The Religious Basis

I do not mean to say it will be happy every moment, or that there will not come between even such lives moments of misunderstanding, what we call vulgarly "quarrels"; but the readjustments of happier conditions will inevitably occur, where similar difficulties without religious basis would grow into final estrangement and separation. I do not think it is always the case that even Christian people make what we call the best selection, or the one which might be best in starting a home. There are undoubtedly in the world many people who are what would be called, in common terms, mismated; and yet even these marriages in very many instances have developed into happy and useful homes because there was underneath all the deeply religious basis of life; and the family with this divine cord of strength, binding all together, has become a permanent and beautiful unit of influence, of power, and of happiness in the world.

The Age of Courtship

There is at this point in the development of this idea a great responsibility resting upon fathers and mothers. It is not, of course, possible or best that parents should interfere, in the large sense of the word, with the love affairs of their children. If at any time in his life a man should have freedom, it should be in the matter of his choice of his life friend and companion; and every Christian parent who has ever given the matter thought—and alas, it is true that many have given it very little thought—will agree that the training of children to think of their home happiness as dependent in the last analysis upon a mutual Christian basis is the only safe training to give them. This training can and should go on as quietly and as uninterruptedly as the atmosphere children breathe. The best example a child ever has of the effect of a real, genuine, consecrated home life is the example he daily sees in his own father and mother. If that is what it ought to be, the father and mother have need to supplement it only by indirect and intelligent teaching. I think no influence is so strong in the mind of a boy or girl when the age of courtship is reached, as the influence of a home where real love and married happiness have been seen as an every-day fact in the persons of the parents.

With this fundamental start in our thought of the home-life of the world, it ought not to be necessary to say very much about the details of what is known as courtship. We accept the term as expressing a fact in human life. We might quarrel to good purpose with some phrases that are used in connection with this period, but with the fact itself there is no quarrel and never should be. The natural and happy and inevitable experience of every well-born, healthy person in the world, is the experience of love-making. It is just as divine and God-given an experience as is the experience we call conversion; and when it is conducted intelligently, there is no happier or more plastic developing time in a young man's or woman's life than this period.

Religious Agreement

I think in all the world there is no experience that should create more joy or add to the richness of life so deeply, as that when two young people realize for the first time that their destiny is one and the same, always understanding that beneath every other feeling and as the basis for this union, there is the common acceptance of the same religious faith. I care not how beautiful or how romantic the courtship may be, or how much may be lavished upon it of fragrance and wealth and high spirits, or how happy the home-life may seem at the beginning, or how free from disorder and care and anxiety—the absence of this religious faith leaves a doubt and an uncertainty concerning the outcome. I would venture to say that practically all the unhappy courtships and marriages of the world may be traced to the absence of the companionship of God in the spirits of those who are about to create a new home on the face of the earth. As to matters of debate and discussion, as to long or short engagements, or the age of those who are about to be married, there is much difference of opinion. The establishment of the family may depend upon so many different circumstances that no rule can be laid down. The main thing is this agreement between the two on the fundamental subject of God in the home. If this is adhered to, the other matters are incidental, though in incidental matters there is room for the exercise of reason and common sense in many cases where neither of them is very visible.

Supposing now the family life has been begun with the divine purpose and the divine companionship fully recognized on both sides, there is always the opportunity before each family of tremendous influence and power in the establishment of that which God blessed as an institution at the start. How great this influence is no family has ever yet discovered or measured. A home in a community radiates influences from itself in every direction. It may lie like a rotten fruit in a basket, contaminating everything it touches, or it may exist as a well-spring of water of life, refreshing and enriching wherever it flows. In other words, it may represent the element of death, or the element of life; and its influence never ceases as long as a single unit of the family exists.

No discussion of the family would be adequate which did not take account of its privileges and its duties. The privileges of the family life may be summed up first in regard to the inner circle. We live in a more complex atmosphere than our fathers or grandfathers knew. Life seems more hurried; duties and responsibilities more clamorous. Civilization seems to have robbed us of our peace and taken from us our equanimity. We build higher buildings than the world ever saw, and we have harnessed the lightning and can speak to the man on the other side of the world without stringing a wire between; but are we on that account any happier or have we any more leisure? The things which will tend to harass and annoy the home which has been established are the same things which in every age have tended to rub off its bloom and intrude upon its sacred life. So in speaking of the privileges of the family I would mention among the first of them the privilege of its inner religious life.

Family Prayer

After the family has been established, after the man and woman have become one through marriage, nothing could be further out of the way than to go on with such a union leaving God out of the account. If the marriage is divine to start with, it should be divine to continue with. The sacred things which belong to the inner circle are the moments of communion and praise and prayer together. As children blossom into this inner circle and sit about the table looking at father and mother the first thing they notice after being allowed to come to the table should be the fact that father is the high priest. Before the food is eaten God is thanked for it, and before the day's work is begun some note of praise is sounded by the head of the family to the Author of the family.

It is a strange idea which many parents have that they can train their children to be good and useful and God-fearing and yet omit from their daily lives every sound or syllable whatsoever referring to God as the head of the family. Whatever may be said about the old custom of family worship, this can truly be said: The children who grew up in the atmosphere of an honest attempt to thank God and ask for his blessing, were children who carried with them in all of after life a sense of the divine presence as a part of their working-day world. I think no example leaves so strong an impression upon a child's mind as the sight of his father in the morning reading out of the Bible, and then offering a prayer of thanks and petition on the day that lies before the family. The father thanks the good God for the night's rest, for the food on the table, for health and strength, for the love which exists in the family among the members of it; he asks for blessing on the lad as he goes to school, that he may be kept in the right way as he studies and plays, and finally he joins with all, great and small, in the Lord's Prayer. If there is anything in modern life which is better than this, let us find it and use it. It is only the intelligent expression of the faith which the true family possesses. It begins the day's work in the right way. This belongs to the inner circle of privilege.

Family Confidence

Another inner circle of privilege is the family council. Father and mother become friends and companions to their children. There are no dangerous secrets to be kept back. The lad is encouraged to talk of his school and his work, of his games and his play. But there are proper times and seasons. Mealtimes, for example, are not times to discuss one's troubles. Whatever other part of the day is reserved for complaining, it should not faith enjoins fidelity to each other only, Druse for Druse; mutual protection and resistance; renunciation of all other religions; profession of the unity of Hakem as God; recognition of God's unity in all things; recognition of God's will; complete obedience to his orders as revealed through his incarnation and saints. Our prayers are those of praise and adoration only. A petition would be impertinent, as it would interfere with the will of God. Yet we are not fatalists like the Mohammedans. Our faith sometimes authorizes missions of vengeance and executions. I see you think that is horrible. Do not your highest courts of justice authorize punishments of incarcerations and hangings? Should not ours have the same power? For this is our highest court. Hakem taught that an insult must always be avenged. This, however, is not a true principle of law for a great and good people. Better is the axiom of your teacher, 'Return good for evil.'

This lady remembers the massacre of Christians in 1860. She saved many at the peril of her own life and hid them in a cave. Her act was discovered by her husband, who kept it secret but divorced her.

"The Western civilization is coming," she continued, "but I should say it is already here. Look!" and the old lady handed me a bundle of photographs. "These are our daughters, mine and my old friends'. Are they not as beautiful, as cultured, and as clever as your ladies? Here are our sons. These are our grandchildren. These lambs of the flock will never see a Druse uprising. These are our leaders. Do they look like fanatics? Two of the girls I hid are still alive and are with me here. What a blessing it is to have them as friends in my old age! Am I a Druse? Well, perhaps; but I am glad that the voice of girl friendship and love spoke louder in me than faithfulness to Druse decrees. Tell your people that the love and fellowship of their Nazarene is walking again through these hills."

The wealthiest man of the Druses lives in Mount Lebanon. He is of the ancient house of Raslan, which had its seat at Schwayfat. I watched him one day as he brought a mule's burden of small stumps down to Beirut. He arose that morning before day, he told me, grubbed the stumps, loaded them on the mule, then walked and drove the mule to the city, which he said was a pleasant walk of nine miles. He sold the load for fifty cents, paid a penny for a loaf of coarse bread, and another for a cake of sweets. He owned houses, vineyards, orchards, and flocks, probably more than he could number, but still worked and lived like a laborer, because that was the teaching of his cult.

The Druses believe in the transmigration of the soul, and look for the birth of a child at about the same time a friend dies. One man died in Rashey at sundown, and his friends were loud in their lamentations till they heard that in a neighboring village a male child had been born, just at sunset, into an ancient and wealthy Druse family. At once the grief was changed into rejoicing.

Whenever I saw those tall, powerful men stalking about with a sinister expression on their proud faces, and thought of the fanatical longing in each breast for the return of their great prophet, I wondered how long it would be till they would go forth again to prepare the way, and the country would run red with Christian blood.

Druse Chiefs of Mount Lebanon

be when the family is at the table. That is the time for mutual and happy interchange of experience. It is a sad time in any family life when the gathering of the family at the table becomes the occasion for gossip, for criticism of the minister and the choir, of the minister's wife and the deacon's son, and the next door neighbor. Many families have destroyed the pleasure of eating, by turning the festal board into a mutual recrimination board, and in foolish and destructive criticism of all things on heaven and earth. If any time should be sacred to the joyful, happy expression of life it should be when the family sits down to the table. Banish care. The father should leave the worries of his office down in the office building. The mother should relegate her household cares to the place where they belong, if she can find it. The children should sit down with happy faces. There should be opportunity for the joke, the humor, and the playfulness of life. America is full of dyspeptics because there are so many people who eat their meals alone or without laughing with anybody. If any one wants a recipe for becoming sour and discontented and unhappy physically, let him continue to eat his meals and talk at the same time complainingly about his woes, and his sins, and his shortcomings, and his aches, and his pains, and his neighbor, especially his neighbor; find fault with his children for being late to the table; tell Johnnie to leave the table and not come back because he forgot to say "thank you" once; hurry the children off to school without kissing them good-by. This will start the family life off in the wrong direction every time. Many families in this country have never learned the happy habit of looking forward to their meals with enjoyment. Among the happy memories of some of the happiest people in the world, as they think of the old home, is the memory of the table and its circle of happy faces.

Among the privileges of the inner circle may also be mentioned the evening gathering. Many families in this age of the world have none. Right after supper, families scatter. This is true among what we call the middle class, the well-to-do people and the working people. It would be sadly safe to say that one might go down the best avenue we have in this city to-morrow night and knock at every door, and rarely find a whole family within the house. The oldest boy is out calling on his girl; the oldest girl has gone to the lecture or entertainment with her young man; the other children are scattered over the neighborhood, calling on other people's children, or running the streets; the father has gone to his lodge, or father and mother have gone to some entertainment or club together, or the wife sits alone in the house, deserted of husband and children, or with only the youngest of all, who, not being quite three years old, lacks a year or two of being out to its party or social function. The freedom which is permitted children in many homes is a fearful comment on the superficial thought which many fathers and mothers give to the needs of child life. There are hundreds of boys and girls wandering up and down the streets of cities like ours, not indulging in anything particularly vicious and wrong, but simply loafing around the streets—young boys and girls who, if they ought not to be in bed, should by all means be at home.

One of the rarest and happiest sights in the world in our American life is the sight of an entire family happily busied at home of an evening. I do not mean to say that families should never go out from their own circle, and that other organizations are not needful to complete the joy of a home. Every real home needs, as a complement to itself, other things. It would not be an ideal family life where father and mother and children existed on a desert island. There must be other families and other organizations to come in and enrich each family life. The man needs his human friendships outside of his own home; the woman needs her human friendships out of her home; the children need friends and companions. They are entitled to them. But the home life is the most sacred of all, and should not be continually interrupted and disturbed by these outside influences, no matter how needful and helpful they may be. Would it be asking too much that at least two nights in the whole week be sacred to the inner circle of the family gathering?

I believe the privileges of the family are not fully understood until this inner circle is understood in all its fulness and power. There is something wrong with a family when, night after night, the boys and girls long to go somewhere else. There should be in every family life a strong and attractive influence within the very circle around the lamp, in front of the hearth, or, if we have no hearth any more on account of the modern heater, then around some common meeting-place where heads are close together and there is innocent amusement. One of the most imperative necessities of the time is that every man and woman who have established a home should make that in some respects the most attractive place on earth, so that no boy or girl would be able to say, "I must go to the theatre right along," or "I must go to the show," or "I must go out to-night." Without curbing in any degree the rightful desire of the boy and girl for outside companionship, the true home ought to be able to say to its children, "After you have tried everything else, you must agree that there is no place like home after all." The fact that this cannot be said of hundreds of homes in a town even as good as ours, is one of the saddest comments on our Christian civilization as far as it has or has not gone.

With this understanding of the establishment of the inner life of the home, we have to consider upon what basis the home may be made the most interesting and attractive place on earth; but that demands a sermon to itself. God bless the homes of this nation! Upon them depend the well-being of future generations, civic righteousness and purity in daily life, the sanctity of future marriages, the binding together of the units of society into one strong bundle of permanent usefulness and power. We cannot over-emphasize the beauty and dignity and usefulness of a real family life which is founded first of all in the love of God, and continued in the daily faith in him as the Father of all mankind.

CALCUTTA'S WHITE SLAVE TRAFFIC

Girls From Many Countries, Including Our Own, Are Among Its Victims

tries of southeastern Europe, but also with the languages of India. For a number of years she has been an active representative of the Women's Friendly Society of India, which has its headquarters in the city of Calcutta. This Society, which was established twenty-one years ago, is devoted to rescue and preventive work among women in the Indian city. Through its efforts, large numbers of young women and girls, some of them little more than children, have been saved from lives of vice and shame, sheltered and cared for, and finally either placed in the care of Christian families, or returned to their own homes.

Calcutta is a cosmopolitan city and almost every nationality is represented in its population. Like many other Eastern cities, it has a "seamy side." Young girls are lured thither from other lands by unscrupulous men and women, under various pretexts, only to find themselves deceived and ensnared. Many who have thus been enticed have never again seen home or friends, but have passed the remainder of their lives in dens of a class peculiar to the Orient.

It is among these unfortunates that Mrs. Barrett Lennard has been working as a rescue missionary for a number of years, and through her efforts startling revelations of the nature and extent of this "white slave traffic" have been made and its hidden infamy brought to light.

"The rescue of these women from lives of shame and degradation, as well as their relief from distress and trouble," said Mrs. Lennard a few days ago, "is a work which awakens an interest and sympathy among all right-minded people. Our Women's Friendly Society, whose work has been recognized and commended by the Bengal government, has sent me to appeal to Christian America to lend a helping hand in this work. I come with the endorsement of the Bishop of London. Our Society has among its patrons the Bishop of Calcutta, Sir Andrew Fraser and Lady Fraser, and Lady Minto, wife of the Governor General of India. Among the other officers are a number of ladies of the highest social standing in India. We have also a committee of gentlemen, of which Rev. J. Macrae, of Calcutta, is secretary. There is an English branch, with Lady Bagley as president and Lady Ward as vice-president, and a full list of officers.

"We have just completed the organization of an American Committee for the purpose of interesting the good people of this country in our work among the poor white and Eurasian women. Before coming here, I visited England, where we formed a connection with the National Vigilance Association, which is now actively co-operating with us. Among the women to whom our Society is proving a real means of rescue from a fate worse than death, are Austrians, Germans, Russians, French, Italians, Englishwomen and Jewesses, and there are even Americans to be found among them. This last statement will no doubt surprise people here; but it is nevertheless true that American girls have been among the victims of this nefarious traffic.

"It is the hope of our Society to be able, with the

they have learned that there is an American side to this sad problem."

From Mrs. Barrett Lennard it was further learned that many of the victims of this traffic have been enticed out to India through promises of remunerative employment. They have found themselves friendless and penniless in a foreign land, ignorant of any language but their own, and absolutely at the mercy of their false friends. Mrs. Lennard has come to them in their distress, as one to whom they can turn and in whom they can confide. Many have been sheltered whilst the necessary steps were being taken to put them into positions to earn an honest livelihood in India or to provide for their passage to Europe and to make arrangements for their being received and looked after by responsible persons on their arrival there.

Lord Curzon

The Bengal government has already made two grants to the Society for this work and in this country Mrs. Lennard has received the kindest encouragement from Bishop Potter, Mr. John Wanamaker, and many others, who are deeply interested. It is believed that many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who have already done so much for India, both in famine and orphan work, and also in missionary effort, will be led to aid this very worthy endeavor of the Calcutta ladies to save their unfortunate sisters from other lands who are stranded in the Indian city under such distressing circumstances. Mrs. Lennard would be pleased to address churches and missionary and other societies. The story of her life and experiences among these poor unfortunates is one to which few people can listen and remain unmoved.

Rev. Henry Otis Dwight, D.D., LL.D., is Chairman of the American Committee, and among the members are Rev. Daniel S. Gregory, D.D., LL.D., Mr. R. M. Stratton, and G. H. Sandison, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mr. Randolph R. Beam, Bible House, New York, is Secretary and Treasurer, to whom all contributions should be sent.

The work is a most deserving one, which we trust will enlist liberal support among our readers and their friends. Every contribution will be acknowledged in these columns.

aid of our friends here and in England, to provide a temporary home as a haven of rest for those who have been rescued and who need some such shelter in an emergency. In such a home we could care for them to better advantage than under our present limited arrangements, and could keep them in safety until they were either transferred to their own country and people or placed with respectable and reliable families in India. Lord Curzon, late viceroy of India, has vouched for the worthy character of our work.

"Since coming here," she added, "I have visited many friends, who are sympathetically interested, since

THE ENGLISH SUFFRAGETTES

IN the current issue of Charities, Elizabeth B. Butler tells the dramatic story of the struggles and sufferings of the English women who have been the leaders in the recent suffrage agitation there.

The year before last, in the north of England, a new phase of the movement started. A college woman who had taken her degree in law and was not allowed to practise because she was a woman, a few factory girls, some mill girls, began to make street speeches. At Christmas time they sang carols and collected money enough to keep on with their work. "A very little goes far with us in England," said one lady, "for we are much more accustomed to speak on street corners than in halls. We stand on a chair or an orange box, then we ring a dinner bell and just keep on until the audience comes. It doesn't take long. Then we begin." From town to town the girls went, gaining the interest of the people each week more and more, in reality bringing once again to a living issue the cause of justice to women. Finally they came up to London and said that they were going to convert the city.

On the twenty-first of last October, the leading women in the movement met to decide on a course of action. "It was decided that we go to the House of Commons on the opening day; that we send in to the prime minister, and if he would not see us, that we there in the House of Commons make known our demands. Two or three hundred women from the East End of London we told to come with us to the Parliament buildings. Twenty women were admitted on that day, so the majority, the poor women from East London, were left outside. The others entered the passageway between the House of Lords and the Commons. They asked an audience of the prime minister, but he refused to see them. Then one of those who had entered, a young girl, stood up on a chair, and cried out, "I demand the rights of citizenship." The police rushed in in great force. "We all joined hands round," said one of them afterward, "and held on until she was dragged down. Mrs. Despard said the same words. She was dragged down in the same way. Then came my turn. I was dragged down and out into the street. Meanwhile, the women outside were holding a meeting and they were arrested too. "The leaders were released on bail, and obliged to appear before the magistrate. The charge was 'abusive language.' The magistrate said we could be bound over to keep the peace for six months if we would give up £10. We refused. So he said, 'Two months in the second division'—the prison reserved for ordinary criminals."

There were eight hundred women in that prison, most of them sentenced for drunkenness or infanticide. The narrator adds: "We were put in solitary confinement. We had small, dark, barred cells with tiny, narrow gratings at the top at one side. We couldn't see the sun; we couldn't see the light; we never got any fresh air. Only for a few hours in the day we were allowed to go into the courtyard. There we walked in line, round and round in the little courtyard, always in the same direction, until we could scarcely stand. We had to sew postmen's bags by hand for six or eight hours of the day. We might have worn our own clothes, but we didn't. We wore the old prison clothes, which didn't fit us, but which were given out as they happened to come. We refused, too, to take privileges in our food; we continued with the prison fare, insufficient, ill-cooked, monotonous, chosen with no regard for nourishment."

THE FAREWELL TO THE FLEET

The President's Warship "Mayflower" Inspecting the Fleet

The Fleet of Battleships Passing Out to Sea

AFTER months of careful planning and preparation, the great white ships of the American battleship fleet have weighed their anchors, passed the twin capes that close in Hampton Roads, and are heading southward on the blue Atlantic on their cruise to the Pacific Coast. At the moment this strikes the eye of the reader the ships are thousands of miles from American shores, and the "jackies" on watch at night see the northern stars dropping slowly down over the path astern, while at day there is naught to see but the vast expanse of sea over which the blue bowl of the sky seems to fit tightly down.

The departure of the greatest fleet ever collected at one point for the longest cruise of modern times was an inspiring spectacle for every American whose heart beats high on an occasion like this with a love of country and his country's flag. The most remote interior towns were as interested as those on the coasts, for not only do the battleships bear the names of many States, but there are officers and men from almost every State in the Union. Thousands of people assembled in the towns about Hampton Roads to bid their friends farewell, and then watch the white hulls glide outward to the sea.

The day before the sailing of the fleet was one of great activity. The hotels at Fortress Monroe were filled with the wives and families of the officers who were about to leave. Those who came late found difficulty in securing accommodations, so great was the demand. Through the afternoon and evening the scene was a brilliant one. The ladies were dressed in their best gowns and all of the officers wore their natty uniforms of blue and gold. Mothers walked proudly beside their stalwart sons who have devoted their lives to the service of the country, while wives and sweethearts bravely tried to force back the tears as they thought of the parting on the morrow.

Most of the officers when they left shore that evening, carried under their capes numerous suggestive boxes and parcels that had been given them by their wives and daughters with strict injunctions not to untie a string until Christmas morning, when the ships will stop at Trinidad. That night the ships had their fires lit, steam up, and were held to their positions by single anchors. Both officers and men, as Admiral Evans put it, "were ready and anxious to go."

On Monday morning, a little after eight o'clock, the Mayflower with the President and his party on board was seen steaming rapidly toward the fleet.

It was a wonderful sight that greeted the eyes of President Roosevelt. The ships made a great horseshoe with their white hulls, and they were dressed with bunting from stem to stern. The Mayflower first passed the fort, whose sides sparkled with the flashes of twenty-one guns. As she neared the fleet, the rails of the double line of ships, headed by the Connecticut and the Minnesota, were manned by lines of sailors, who stood with their hands on one another's shoulders. The marines were at the salute, and the bands played "America." The Mayflower steamed to a point between the Missouri and the Louisiana and anchored. The flagship signals were at once run up above the lines of bunting, the bugles blared hoarsely, and the fussy little launches darted out from the sides of the battleships, carrying the admirals and the captains to pay their respects to the President. As Admiral Evans stepped aboard, the red-coated band played "Hail to the Chief." Mr. Roosevelt talked long and earnestly with the Admiral, evidently impressing some important matters in regard to the cruise. For all of the other officers he had a brief word of greeting and farewell. He sent a message to "the men behind the guns," that was greatly appreciated.

The Admiral returned to the Connecticut, and the Mayflower, pulling her anchor out of the mud, turned around and steamed back. The flagship signaled for the first column to proceed at half speed. The little Yankton took position on the right of the eight battleships in the first line as they turned; the Mayflower, two miles ahead, was leading the way out to sea. As the first line drew ahead, the second, under the command of Rear-Admiral Thomas, wheeled about with magnificent precision and followed the first line outward. It took a few moments for the Minnesota, his flagship, to get her exact distance at the head of the second eight. When she did, the fleet steamed on, every ship at exact distance from the one before. The line extended from front to rear a distance of over six miles. At last the Mayflower anchored at the point called "the tail of the horseshoe," and waited for the fleet to pass in the final review.

To those on the Mayflower it was a thrilling spectacle. On came the long white line that stretched back as far as the eye could reach. The magnificent Connecticut led, her sharp bow sending up a great white comb on either side, her yellow funnels towering many feet in the air and belching dense clouds of black smoke. The Stars and Stripes streamed backward, and the blue-starred flag of Admiral Evans snapped sharply in the wind. As she swept abreast of the Mayflower, the sailors could be seen manning the rails, the marines at attention. Every officer, in full-dress uniform, drew his sword and saluted toward the President, the drums ruffled, the bugles called, and the bands struck up the national air. Admiral Evans stood on the rear bridge with his sword drawn.

The President, as the battleship passed, raised his hat. The next moment the Connecticut had cleared the Mayflower and began to fire her farewell twenty-one guns. A few hundred yards behind the leader, another battleship churned the water into foam. Again the bands played and the decks shimmered with the wave of saluting swords. On the rear bridge of this vessel, and all the rest of the ships, the commanding officers stood high above the decks, and from the secondary batteries came the roar of the presidential salute.

At last the rearmost ship went by. The Mayflower hoisted her anchor and headed back for the trip to Washington. For a long time the President stood watching the pride of the navy as it turned southward. The white hulls gleamed for a moment in a passing ray of sunshine, and then there was but the horizon line of blue, from which rose long streamers of black smoke. By wireless it is known that the ships are proceeding safely.

New-Year Greetings

CONFORMING to the good old custom, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to-day greets its readers throughout the homeland and the world with the best wishes for a happy, prosperous and useful New Year.

1908 opens auspiciously with a very marked increase in the numerical strength of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family. Increased circulation brings wider opportunities for Christian service and added spiritual responsibilities. We are thankful that, in those paths of effort toward which the energies of the paper and its friends have been turned in past years, some things have been accomplished which, by God's grace, have become an inspiration and a blessing to many. May the year just begun eclipse all of its predecessors in those deeds of kindness, of helpfulness, of love for humanity, which have long been the special field of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family.

What the coming months may bring no one can know. The future is wisely hidden with God. Let us hold ourselves in the attitude of faithful servants, followers of the Master, ready cheerfully to do his will. So we will be prepared for any emergency that may arise, which affords an opportunity to advance the cause of humanity, and to set up the standard of Christ's kingdom among the nations of the world. Thus, with stout hearts and a firm purpose, let us prepare to enjoy the blessings and to do the work that lie before us in the New Year.

Equals and Comrades

SHOULD a husband simply because of his sex attempt to dominate his wife, setting her opinions aside, treating her as if she were an undeveloped child, and taking upon himself the manner of master of the house? Is this fair to an intelligent and loving wife, and will this attitude induce deference to her wishes on the part of her sons? Is it commendable or bearable? These questions come in a letter. Between the lines one reads an everyday lesson of regrettable mistakes, an everyday experience of sorrow and strife. A thousand times no, is the answer that must be given. The husband who in these days seriously fancies himself an over-lord in the household is either medieval or stupid. He is out of the current of the times. The word "obey" in the marriage ritual was never intended to be taken literally, or to mean the implicit obedience of a slave.

Husbands are to love their wives as Christ loves the Church. A modern husband, whose ideal of domestic life is that he is an autocrat and his wife a person subject to his authority, will signally fail in carrying out his endeavors, and will succeed in making his home a place of wretchedness. Married people should be first of all congenial friends; they are comrades on the road. Mutual consideration, mutual politeness, common interests and faithful affection must unite them, or the children will be the greatest sufferers. Boys copy their father and learn to regard their mother as the queen of the home, and their sisters as princesses when the father's attitude is worthy of the good old name of gentleman.

Labor Depression Abroad

AN unexpected sequel has followed the phenomenal exodus of aliens from American ports during the last four weeks, which was recently described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. This season has eclipsed all previous records in the numbers of those who have returned to their old-world homes, many no doubt intending to pass the winter there, and to come back to this country next spring. Doubtless a considerable proportion of the whole have been moved to this course by the temporary industrial depression here, resulting from the recent panic. Their arrival in Germany, Austria and Italy, the cable dispatches say, seems likely to produce an industrial crisis in those countries. So serious has the situation become in some parts of Germany that it has even been proposed to pass a law designed to protect home labor by keeping out the least desirable of the returning immigrants, although such an extreme step seems hardly probable. A majority of the returning immigrants are of the thrifty class, who no doubt are sufficiently supplied with funds to support themselves during their stay. In Austria the influx has caused a rise in land values, hundreds of farms being purchased by the returned immigrants, who have saved money during their sojourn in America.

Presumably, the larger part of those who have left us are non-citizens, belonging to the great class which constitutes our floating population, drifting hither and thither in obedience to the demands of the labor market. It is asserted by those who have made a study of immigration, that the presence of this class in the United States, under the circumstances, is of doubtful value. This subject, with others relating to the immigration question, will probably come up among the matters to be considered by the International Immigration Conference proposed by Commissioner Sargent, which is expected to meet some time next spring. European governments, as well as our own, are vitally interested in the regulation of immigration. Italy, Greece, Germany and the Scandinavian countries are especially concerned, and it will be interesting and instructive to note how they propose to remedy the wholesale exodus of their people which has been going on steadily for years, and which has left large sections of European territory practically destitute of able-bodied workers.

The People and the Motto

AN enormous number of letters has been received in response to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's invitation to its readers for an expression of their opinions on the removal of the motto. Last week's symposium, which covered two pages of our issue of December 25, was only the beginning of the flood of correspondence, which has continued to increase daily ever since. Of the whole number, little more than three per cent. approve the elimination of the motto, while ninety-seven per cent. absolutely disapprove, and record their protest in unmistakable terms. In view of the fact that these protests come from all sections and classes throughout the Union, every State being represented, we feel warranted in regarding them as a fair illustration of the sentiment of the whole American people on this question. It is a plebiscite.

As it is impracticable for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to publish all of these letters, we have forwarded them in bulk to the Hon. Ollie M. James of Kentucky, one of the two Congressmen who recently introduced bills in the House of Representatives providing for the restoration of the motto. We trust that by so doing this great mass of correspondence may not be without its weight and influence when the subject comes up for discussion before the House.

National Beacons

IN these times of broad tolerance, there is a tendency to condemn the Puritans and the Pilgrim Fathers for their prejudices and narrowness. We boast that we have outgrown all that. The burning of witches, the blue laws and the severe penalties for offenses now deemed trivial, belong, we are told, to a barbarous age in which the attempt was made to compel every man to be at least outwardly pious. There can be no doubt that the moral stringency of the Puritanical times was a yoke that was hard to bear; but we should be careful lest the reaction proceed to an extent dangerous to the public welfare. Those grim and gloomy men laid an excellent foundation for the national edifice. They frowned on theatrical entertainments, legislated against gaming, betting and horse-racing, but they insisted on righteousness and public morality. The people became restive under their rule and demanded that there should be some relaxation. There is more than a possibility that the pendulum has swung too far in that direction and that we are in danger as a people of forgetting God and his day altogether.

History cries aloud warnings against godlessness. The nations that become irreligious surely perish. One shrinks from arguing for religion on the ground that it pays. That is a very low plane on which to plead for faith and duty. The question of profit and gain that will come from pursuing any right course ought not to be considered. We should do right, because it is right, and not through fear of consequences, or the hope of prosperity. But there are minds to which only such an argument appeals. Men who cannot be induced to worship and serve God and observe his day for conscientious reasons, may be influenced by patriotic considerations. They love their country and are proud of its progress. To all such, the present tendency toward godlessness should be a beacon of warning. The desecration of the Lord's Day, the increase of divorce, the growing lawlessness which is seen among rich and poor, are all indications of the national drift which we cannot afford to ignore. In ancient and modern days such indications have been ominous. Nations great as this have perished, some are now perishing slowly before our eyes, not through poverty, not through tyranny, but simply because they forgot God and ignored his laws. God save this land, for which our fathers suffered and bled, from such a fate!

Our Esperanto Course

THE first lesson in our Complete Course of Esperanto will appear in next week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Other lessons will follow every second week throughout the course. These lessons are prepared by an expert Esperantist and will carry the student along by easy and pleasant steps to a complete mastery of this wonderful new language, which is now being taught in public schools, high schools and even in universities in other countries. We can conceive of no more agreeable or profitable occupation for one evening twice a month than this study of a simple, natural language, which seems destined soon to become the medium of international commerce and diplomacy. It should be studied in circles of six or eight persons, working intelligently and harmoniously together for a common end.

In the Foreign Field

—MRS. ADELINE B. HUME, missionary, writes from Salonica, Turkey, thanking readers of this journal for aid rendered to her Christian school project.

—MRS. KITTIE WOOD (Kumara Kulasinghe), a missionary at Kuwara Ehya, Ceylon, has a very promising Sunday School, which is doing good work among the native children. She needs Bibles for the scholars.

—REV. MR. BAKER of Dempar, Sudan (a worker of the Sudan Mission), reports the king of the native tribes there as friendly and willing to listen to the Gospel and even as declaring himself willing to abide "by the counsel of God." Mr. Baker lately addressed over one hundred people, and at the close of the service dismissed the women and children and talked to the king and his attendants.

General View of the Mines at Goldfield, Nev.

Hon. Herbert Knox Smith

Labor Trouble at Goldfield

A CUTE labor trouble at Goldfield, Nev., has been the source of anxiety throughout the mining region for several weeks. There have been smoldering embers of discontent for a long time, as the mine operators have been yielding reluctantly to the demands of the Union. A feeling has long been prevalent that a crisis was at hand, as increasing hostility between the operators and the Union was rapidly increasing. It came to a head on December 2, when, owing to the general financial stringency, the Cook Bank, which is controlled by the Goldfield Mines Company, paid the miners half in cash and half in checks. The miners jumped to the conclusion that they were being defrauded, and a general strike ensued. This was followed by a shut-down of all the mines in camp, throwing ten thousand men out of employment. The Governor of Nevada, fearing violence, and convinced that he had not a sufficient force to maintain order if a conflict occurred, appealed to President Roosevelt for the assistance of United States troops. General Funston was accordingly ordered to Goldfield from San Francisco, with such force as he deemed necessary. The President sent explicit instructions that the troops were to hold themselves strictly neutral. They were to preserve order, without taking sides with the miners or the operators. No man was to be molested so long as he behaved peaceably. The feeling in certain quarters ran high against the men, and the President feared that, without this warning, the miners might not have a square deal in the dispute. In order to get an adequate understanding of the conditions, the President decided also to send a special commission to inquire into the merits of the controversy and report. It consists of Lawrence O. Murray, Assistant Secretary of Commerce and Labor; Herbert Knox Smith, Commissioner of Corporations, and Charles P. Neill, Commissioner of Labor. It is most devoutly to be hoped that the trouble may be settled amicably and quickly. The employers and the miners inevitably suffer while work is suspended. To both sides the warning uttered long ago by the apostle may well be given:

If ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another. (Gal. 5: 15.)

Heroism on a Bridge

Two of the men employed in building the new bridge over the East River, New York, did an heroic thing recently. Their names were Oliver Jude and John J. McGlynn. They were assigned to the duty of watching a heavy plate that was being raised to the top of the tower on the Long Island City side, and to fasten it the moment it was in proper position. On a platform below them were other workers who were manipulating the hoisting apparatus. The huge block of steel slowly rose and the men stood ready to drive in the gear, but there was some blunder. Instead of it resting on the supports, it rested on the inclined beams, and was gradually sliding off, to the consternation of Jude and McGlynn, who knew that its fall meant instant death to the men below. They shouted at the top of their voice to the men in charge of the tackle to hoist the plate higher, but in the meantime it was slipping. There was a crevice in the slanting beam, and before the plate reached it, each man thrust his arm into it. The brave act checked the plate for a minute, but not even bones could resist such mighty pressure. The plate slowly ground through the obstacles, but not until the tackle had been applied and the sliding of the plate arrested. Then the men were brought down and sent to a hospital, where their wounds were dressed. Each had lost a hand, but they had saved the lives of their fellow workers. It was a noble thing to do. We admire men who voluntarily suffer that others may be saved; but how few, comparatively, realize that our own hope of eternal life is built on such self-sacrifice which Christ made for the human race.

Christ hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God. (I. Peter 3: 18.)

Seeking a Father

An elderly man entered a police court in Yorkville, N. Y., a few days ago, to obtain assistance in a peculiar search. He told the magistrate that he had hitherto passed under the name of "Love," but he was well aware that it was not his right name. He had come from Ohio to New York in the hope of discovering some trace of his father, whose name he did not know. All he remembered of his childhood was that when he was a very small boy he wandered away from home and was taken before a Judge sitting in a court on upper Park Avenue. He was sent to a foundling asylum, and later adopted by Dr. William Love of Mount Vernon, Ohio. His object in calling upon the magistrate was to hunt up the records of his commitment to the asylum. It will be impossible for him to do this, as they were destroyed when the old Court House at Eighty-sixth Street and Park Avenue was burned during the Civil War. His adoption took place before that date. Perhaps the father searched for his wandering boy and failed to find him. The boy, however, has allowed more than forty years to pass before instituting any inquiries, and cannot be surprised now if his search is in vain. It may be hoped that he will seek his heavenly Father if he has not already done so, and in that search, if it is sincere, success is assured.

If thou seek him, he will be found of thee. (I. Chron. 28: 9.)

A Kidnapped Girl

A Chicago family is rejoicing over the recovery of a lost daughter. She was eight years old and the pet of the family. On December 7 she was playing on the lawn in front of her home, but completely disappeared. Search was made for her everywhere, but she could not be found. It was remembered that a number of gipsies had been in the neighborhood and the parents feared that they had carried her off. A reward of a thousand dollars was offered for her recovery. No tidings came of her for some time, but one day a farmer living near Momence, a village east of Kankakee, Ill., reported having seen a barefoot child wearily following a gipsy wagon as it passed his home. The child did not look like a gipsy child and she walked as if unaccustomed to walking barefoot. Inquiries were at once made and the gipsy wagon was traced. Several persons visited the camp and while one of them conversed with the only woman in charge, the others searched for the child. She was found and in some trepidation told her name, which was that of the missing Chicago girl. She said the gipsies had tried to make her steal and had beaten her severely. She appeared to be half-starved and was evidently in great fear of her captors. The police were summoned, but all the gipsies but two escaped. One of them, who is an ex-convict, is suspected of having kidnapped other children. The child was glad to be restored to her parents. It may be hoped that her experience will lead her to be on her guard in years to come, against the enemy of souls, whose delight it is to bring people into captivity.

Be sober, be vigilant; because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour. (I. Peter 5: 8.)

A Sister's Plea

A distressing scene was witnessed in the Court of General Sessions in New York recently. A merchant who has recently become bankrupt was brought before Judge Foster for sentence. The case was very simple, as the whole of his stock and other assets had disappeared, leaving absolutely nothing for his creditors. It was alleged that a large part of the property had been disposed of after the bankruptcy proceedings had been begun, and it was for this act that he had been tried and convicted. As is usual, the question was asked if there was any reason why he should not be sentenced. An appeal for mercy was made by his wife and sister. The latter was very eloquent. She said: "Judge, take my life and let my brother go home. I am willing to sacrifice myself for his sake." She was so deeply affected that she fainted and had to be carried out of court. The judge was profoundly moved, but on learning from the Assistant District Attorney that the defendant had manifested no sign of repentance and had not attempted to make restitution, he decided to disregard the plea for mercy and sent him to prison without the option of a fine. The idea that his sister could suffer in his place of course could not be entertained. Every man must bear the penalty of his own wrongdoing. Neither in our courts nor at God's tribunal can one human being suffer in the place of another. God does not apply the principle of the atonement to a mere human substitute.

None of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him. (Ps. 49: 7.)

A Builder's Set-off

A curious dispute was submitted to a judge at Mineola, L. I., for settlement recently. A builder presented a claim on a farmer for three hundred dollars for work done on his farm. It was disclosed that the builder had formerly been engaged to the farmer's daughter, but the engagement had been broken. The bill had been presented after the rupture, and there was a hint that the commercial transaction had been complicated by personal feeling. Part of the claim was for the making of a bird-house for which thirty-five dollars was charged. It was contended that the builder had practically made the bird-house as a gift to the young lady. The witnesses said that she had been enraptured with it when the builder brought it, and laughingly declared she could not pay for it. The builder replied that she could, as he would feel himself amply repaid with a kiss. The builder at the trial repudiated the agreement, and said the bird-house was well worth the money charged for it in his bill. To his surprise, however, the judge pronounced the contract binding, and in giving judgment for the balance of the claim deducted the charge for the bird-house, which he regarded as having been paid for at the price demanded. The builder appeared mortified by the decision. The change in his feelings had changed his estimate of values. It is so in spiritual matters. Prizes once deemed of the highest value are despised when conversion has taken place.

Howbeit what things were gain to me, those have I counted loss. (Phil. 3: 7.)

PROTECTING THE WORKER

ON the upper floor of a large mercantile building in West Twenty-ninth Street, New York, there has been established a museum which is of the greatest interest to all who work with their hands or are employers of labor. It is called the Museum of Safety Devices and Social Hygiene, and when fully equipped it will have on exhibition all of the various appliances that have been invented to protect the lives of workers in the "dangerous trades." When the statistics are studied it will be found that there are indeed few trades that do not come under this head. There are already installed a number of pieces of protective apparatus. The collection of photographs illustrating the subject is extensive, and the library is undoubtedly the most comprehensive in America in its special line.

The President, Dr. Josiah Strong, and Dr. William Tolman, the Director, have been carrying on an educational campaign for the last ten years among employers, workmen, and people who are interested in movements for the general improvement of conditions of the toilers. Their path has been an uphill one. They found that employers at first regarded safety devices as adding greatly to the cost of machinery, and they found the workmen indifferent to their own safety. If the protective device interfered in no way with the speed of the machine he was operating, the workman regarded it with toleration; if it retarded him on piece work, he wanted the protective appliance removed and he was willing to take the risk.

The various appliances that the directors have on exhibition, or of which they have photographs, are comparatively inexpensive, and some have already been adopted in this country. The ideas for most of them have come from abroad, where the life of the worker has been much better protected than in America. We are apt to think of Russia as far behind the United States, yet in all of the Russian factories the dangerous parts of the machinery are painted red—a simple device, but one that has saved an untold number of lives.

American inventors have begun to turn their attention to providing devices to protect the workers who operate the marvelous machines that American ingenuity has created. Exposed cogs and wheels are being covered. Where women operators are employed, exposed cogs have often caught and torn the hair and scalp from the head of some worker who had stooped too low for a moment over her work. A short time ago a prominent manufacturer from New Jersey was visiting the museum and his attention was caught by the picture of workmen who were operating a revolving saw. The workman stood on a mat of ribbed rubber that prevented him from falling forward on the saw. Such accidents are quite common where the machines have been in operation for killed every year than fell on both sides during the three years of the Boer War. Enough men give up their lives every twelve months to supply the number of killed and wounded in our Civil War and the Franco-Prussian War, if those two bloody contests went on indefinitely. In New York City alone last year there were nine fatal accidents a day, which would make 3,406 for the year.

In New York State in three months, 800 women and children had their fingers mutilated by using unguarded punches. In reference to this, it should be said that Dr. Tolman is making a great effort to secure the adoption of protective devices on the various machines that are operated by women and children in shops and factories, and that if the small amount needed can be secured, this will be made a special department of their work, and a special section of the museum will be set apart to show devices and photographs. The havoc wrought among the women and children workers in the cotton mills by consumption, they have found by enlargements of photographs to be caused by the operatives inhaling small bits of cotton floating in the air of the workroom. Little gauze masks have been invented that protect the nose and mouth, and if their adoption can be secured, the great white plague will find fewer victims in the mills. Most factories have particles of dust floating about in sorting and packing rooms, where the work is all practically done by young girls. A few plants have installed metal tubes that suck the dust-laden air from about the working benches. They should be installed wherever the "dust menace" exists. A picture of one of these metal tubes is given in the present article. In the museum are bottles filled with dust collected from the air of various factories, and as one reads the various labels he wonders how any of the workers breathing these hard particles could exist for more than a few years. In fact, in some trades it seems as if with the present old-fashioned methods in vogue, women and children are signing their own death warrants, unless they are taught how to protect their own health, and those who employ them are shown that protective devices exist.

A small sum is needed to start this work for the protection of women and children who have to earn their livelihood with their hands. Any inquiries in regard to the matter will be gladly answered by Dr. William H. Tolman, 231 West Thirty-ninth Street, New York City.

some time and the wooden floors have become slippery from the constant pressure of the workers' shoes.

"Why," said the manufacturer, "that's a good idea. I guess I'll adopt that. Why, only the other day one of the workmen in my place slipped and fell forward. He struck the saw, and before he could be pulled back, the saw had cut clear through the man's ribs."

The necessity for the active work that is being conducted by the officials of the museum is best shown by a few comparisons taken from statistics collected at the museum. In two days more people are killed by accidents in various industries than were killed in battle in the war with Spain. Every year there are twice as many killed as fell in both the French and English armies during the three years of the war with Russia in the Crimea. On our railroad lines there are more signing their own death warrants, unless they are taught how to protect their own health, and those who employ them are shown that protective devices exist.

A small sum is needed to start this work for the protection of women and children who have to earn their livelihood with their hands. Any inquiries in regard to the matter will be gladly answered by Dr. William H. Tolman, 231 West Thirty-ninth Street, New York City.

A SCIENTIST ON IMMORTALITY

ONE of the most eminent living scientists, Sir Oliver Lodge, of England, discussed the question of immortality in a recent lecture delivered before an audience of distinguished scientists in London. In a cable dispatch to the New York Sun, an outline of his views is given, which is profoundly interesting, coming from such a source. Sir Oliver said:

The body was no more representative of the individual than a worn-out suit of clothes. Death merely removed the soul's instrument of manifestation. It resembled the destruction of an organ, which left the organism untouched.

Death merely marked the end of a certain grouping of physical materials. Consciousness, will, honor, love and admiration are similarly stamped with immortality and will not drop into nothingness. Such creatures as insects and trees can hardly be supposed to have persistent personal existence, as they lack individuality; but there can be no doubt of the continuance of human individuality.

Part of the evidence of personal immortality consists of psychological manifestations, such as when one's mind appears to act upon another at a distance. Telepathy or clairvoyance must be regarded as having practically established certain facts too numerous and too well authenticated to be doubted, but this science is still in the rudimentary stage.

"We would be clearly wrong," said the lecturer, "in assuming that all automatic messages are not of a genuine character. To say that spiritual manifestations are futile and inappropriate is quite untrue. Such a statement is only to be made by persons not acquainted with the facts.

"The fact that the higher faculties of the soul have no special sphere of employment in the struggle for existence appears to suggest the coming of a fuller and larger existence. Possibly these high faculties, which now seem incongruous and inconvenient, may ultimately be found to be nearer the heart of things than faculties better suited to this world.

"It is the duty of science to examine even into the domain of religion. The intentions of the Creator of the universe are not going to be frustrated by the efforts of his creatures."

GRANDMA'S NEW YEAR'S CALLER

By HELEN H. THOMAS

IN her youth great preparations were always made for the first day of the year, especially as to one's attire, for New Year's greetings began early in the morning and lasted until midnight, if one had an extensive acquaintance, as had Grandma.

So the woman who had long since left her youth behind her, and who, like most elderly people, lived much in the past, did not take kindly to the change which the shifting years had brought, and usually said to her friends, as each year drew to a close:

"Remember, my latch-string is always clear out on the first day of the year, if on no other; for I am an old-fashioned woman and always keep open house."

Because of that, and because, too, of the warm place this sweet-faced Grandma held in the hearts of old and young alike, she was always given the opportunity to greet a portion of her friends, at least, with "I wish you a happy New Year!" which she did with old-time grace, in spite of advancing years.

The story-teller rarely let slip the privilege accorded Grandma's friends. Being absent from the city, however, one New Year's Day, she called at the earliest opportunity to extend greetings, and was met by:

"It isn't too late to wish you a happy New Year, dear, but I missed you."

"Oh, well," was the laughing rejoinder of the one who received the warm hand-clasp, "I fear you had callers enough to weary you, as it was, for you are looking a little wan, and now you must tell me who they were."

"She had one too many, and that is what ails her," remarked Grandma's care-taker, in a low tone, "but she will tell you about him, for she talks of little else."

"Well, I had callers same's usual," remarked Grandma in an absent-minded way, "that is, for these days, but I'll have to think 'em up, I guess, for my first caller put every one else out of my mind."

"Why, he must have been one of your admirers in the beautiful long ago, about which you talk so much," was the laughing retort.

That it was no laughing matter to Grandma, however, was evident, for she met the foregoing with a shake of the head and, in a very serious tone, said:

"No, no, dear, he was unlike any caller I ever had before, and I never can forget him, never!"

It was plain to be seen that Grandma, for once, was not in a mood to live over the days of Auld Lang Syne, and, too, that she was eager to talk of what was uppermost in her mind; so her questioner settled back for the recital.

"Well, it was like this, dear," said the old lady, as she leaned forward in her customary story-telling attitude. "I couldn't sleep the last hours of the closing year, for I got to thinking over how the Lord had led me, and of all his goodness, until my heart was that full o' gratitude that if it hadn't been for waking folks up I'd broke right out singing."

"You know I keep my old room down stairs, while the rest sleep on the second floor. They've tried to make me think it isn't safe, but I like to be alone so I can talk out loud without disturbing anybody."

"Well, when my clock told me that the New Year had come, I began to think how good my Lord was to spare my unprofitable life to see a New Year, and I sung right out, 'Praise the Lord!' And then I heard a noise like something had dropped, and I opened my eyes and saw some one at my bureau, but the light was so dim I thought at first some of the family was looking for something."

"Then I made out that it was a man, and that he had his cap so drawn down over his face that I couldn't have made out who it was even if I'd known him."

"Why, Grandma!" was the startled exclamation; "you must have been nearly paralyzed with fear!"

"Ah, but you forgot, dear, that I had just been so full of praise that there was no room left for fear of burglars, even. But I had my wits about me, though, I tell you. Sometimes I think it was almost a miracle, too, how much sharper they were than common."

"Anyhow, it all come over me like a flash, how, when I cried out, that man had been startled and dropped something, and how he wasn't there for any good. Now, I was not a mite afraid of his hurting me, or of losing anything I had in my room; but I thought of the precious ones up stairs and I determined, God helping me, to get the burglar out of the house before he'd gone to the second floor."

"I always lie bolstered up in bed on account of my cough, so I didn't change my position any, but reached out my hand and said: 'Come here, son, Grandma wants to talk to you.' And, would you believe it, he edged his way up to the bed and let me take the hand hanging by his side, just as if he was a little boy and good at minding. He wasn't much but a boy either, it seemed to me. He came, anyhow, and I wouldn't let go his hand, but held it tightly as I said: "'When I was a girl I sometimes began to have New Year's callers pretty early, but you've beat the record, so you must excuse my not being ready to receive callers. But, all the same, I wish you a happy New Year.'"

"The burglar hung his head and acted 'shamed like'"

"Why, Grandma! to think of any one as love-shielded as you are, alone talking to a burglar like that! How could you?" cried the guest, in a shocked tone.

"I don't know, dear; I am weak now whenever I think of the risk they all tell me I was running; but I had only one thing in mind then, and that was the safety of my loved ones; so I forgot my own, and I firmly believe I was given courage and wisdom to act wisely by the One who never sleeps."

"Then next I said, just as if I had been talking to my grandson, when he had gone wrong:

"But it hurts me, son, to have to tell you that my wishes can't make it a happy one if you go on like you've started out."

"He hung his head when I said that, and acted so shamed like that I said: 'But, somehow, I don't feel as if you were an old hand at slying into people's rooms, stranger. I think you are some mother's boy who got stranded in this big city, and I'm sorry for you. Say, now, son, I know you don't want to look Grandma in the face, or let her hear the sound of your voice, but when she asks you questions just shake your head, or nod, and she will believe you. And now, is she not right in thinking that midnight calls like this are something new to you?'"

"Then my caller nodded his head, and at the same time I felt his hand tremble, which encouraged me to preach to him a little bit. I can't repeat all I said to him. I talked fast, I tell you, and the right words just came to me then as they never will again, I'm thinking; but I know I pointed to the clock and told him how God had just given him a clean white page to write on, and I begged him to resolve that the first stain on it would be the last, and while I pleaded with him tears dropped from the eyes I couldn't see."

"Then I thought how perhaps hunger led to his wrong-doing, and so I put my hand under the mattress, after releasing it for the first time, and took out five dollars and offered it to him, saying:

"I feel that you are in a tight place and this may help you to start right." But he shook his head and continued to do so until I told him that he might look upon it as a loan. At the same time I took my address from my pocket-book and gave it to him with the money, which was taken with evident reluctance. Then I sprang from the bed and grasping him by the hand again I said, with a nervous laugh: 'I always like to see my callers to the door, and I must see you off.'

"He required no urging, but started to go to the rear of the house where he entered, as we learned later, but I was so distressed for fear he wouldn't get out before he was heard, that I drew him to the side door near my room, and slipping the bolt let him out, saying: 'God bless you, son; my prayers will follow you.'

"Well, there isn't much more to tell, except that—"

"Except that Grandma's nerve forsook her then," added her care-taker; "for after calling for help she collapsed entirely. At first we all thought she was suffering from the effects of a bad dream, but there was sufficient proof to the contrary, however; and I tell you she has been looked upon as a heroine ever since."

"You deserve to be, Grandma!" cried the one who had listened to the story for the first time. "Not one in a thousand would have acted as wisely as you did under such trying circumstances."

"But I give all the credit to One who has never failed me in any emergency," said Grandma, as she wiped away the fast falling tears. "And now you must know the sequel to my strange experience."

Saying that, the speaker drew from her pocket a letter and handed it to her caller—a well-written letter which was both undated and unsigned, and read as follows:

"DEAR, KIND GRANDMA: If I had the courage to face you I would try to tell you how much I owe you for making me see my wicked course that night; but as it is I will only return the money loaned and thank you from a full heart. Yes, I was hungry, and desperate, too! and you know the rest. But I had a grandma once whose idol I was, and when you cried 'Praise the Lord!'—which was so like her—I dropped the silver vase I was about to pocket, and when I faced you I was as weak as a rag, your resemblance to my grandmother was so striking."

"Well, as the result of your kind advice, after breaking a long fast, I took the first train for home and mother. And here on the farm I am going to try and live the clean life you pictured. I told mother all about it, and she says 'Tell her I will try and thank her when we get over yonder!' I will, too, if I am ever worthy to be found in such company."

"At any rate, I got a glimpse of heaven that night, and I can now better understand how God can forgive such sinners as I, when you so warmly clasped the hand of the one who had meant to rob you, and, instead of calling me a thief, wished me a 'Happy New Year' and called me 'Son.' May your God reward you, for I never can."

The foregoing letter was read through blinding tears, and when the reader finished she looked lovingly into the sweet face which had so appealed to the writer of it, but could only trust herself to say:

"That will surely be another star in your crown, Grandma."

A happy sigh alone broke the stillness for a little, and then the aged heroine evasively rejoined:

"Now you can understand, dear, why I can talk only of my first New Year's caller."

Questions and Answers

A. P. Norden, Neb. Have you any authentic record of how Voltaire died? A Catholic monk, the superior of the order, related that his end was hopeless and fearful. According to his tale, Voltaire entreated that a priest might come to him, but his friends would not allow this.

McClintock & Strong's Encyclopedia, which is generally accepted as an authority, says that during his last visit to Paris (on which he had a severe attack of hemorrhage and thought death near) he sought a "reconciliation" with the Church, that he might not be denied Christian burial. He signed a statement that he would die in the Roman Catholic faith, and that he "asked pardon of God and the Church for his sins." He recovered from this attack, but died soon afterward. No details are given as to his actions during the spasm of repentance, but the statement that he sent for or communicated with a priest would seem to be logically borne out by the foregoing facts.

T. E. Oak Hill, O. Why is the United States called "Uncle Sam" and England called "John Bull"?

"Uncle Sam" is said to have had as his original source a man named Samuel Wilson, a well-known employer on the Hudson. When stores came from abroad marked "U. S." (United States), it was said in joke the letters stood for "Uncle Sam." The jest became popular among the soldiers during the war of 1812. "John Bull" was a character in a satire by Dr. Arbuthnot, and was the type of a bluff, kind-hearted, bull-headed farmer. It became popular and was adopted as a national type.

Reader, Lake Ariel, Pa. 1. What is the baptism for the dead to which Paul alludes (I. Cor. 15: 29)? 2. What is the preaching to which Peter refers (I. Peter 4: 6)?

1. Some custom prevalent in the Corinthian church. Probably a Christian concerned about the state of friends who died before hearing of Christ, and so unbaptized, may have been baptized in their name, hoping to benefit them. Paul does not speak of the practice with approbation, but mentions it to show that persons who do such things thereby prove that they believe in a future life, which is the question he is arguing about. 2. It is probably the same as that in I. Peter 3: 19. Theologians generally contend that it refers to the persons now dead who heard the Gospel in their lives. The passage is recognized as mysterious and no wholly satisfactory explanation has been given.

L. P. Macon, Mo. What are the sacred books of Buddhism?

They are called "Pitaka." There are three of them, the first of which contains the statement of doctrines and the exposition of principles of the teaching of Buddha. They were issued about 170 years after his death; according to his disciples, they embodied the teaching of their master. That inscriptions referring to them have been found of as early a date as the third century before Christ indicates that they are genuine. They are written in Pali. The Sanscrit version is distinctly inferior.

Subscriber, Ocracoke, N. C. How many daughters had Mary, the mother of our Lord, and what were their names?

The only places in which our Lord's sisters are mentioned are Matt. 13: 56 and Mark 6: 3, and there nothing is said about the number of them or their names. Christ's brothers are mentioned by all the evangelists, and Matthew and Mark give their names as James, Joses, Simon, and Judas.

J. R. C., Pleasant Hill, Mo. 1. Is there any record of the names of those who came over on the Mayflower? 2. I understand there are two looking glasses in existence that came over; the whereabouts of one is known, the other not. Can you tell us anything about them?

1. There is a full list in the reprint of Gov. Bradford's History of the Plymouth Colony, published by the Secretary of State of Massachusetts. The list of names was printed in the MAIL-BAG of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of April 24, 1907. 2. We never heard of the glasses. In Pilgrim Hall at Plymouth, Mass., are many articles, books, furniture, arms, etc., that came in the Mayflower, while many descendants of the Pilgrims have articles brought over by their ancestors. The glasses mentioned may be in Pilgrim Hall.

A reader in Charlottesville, Va., writes: "This is a different town, since local option was adopted." He encloses an account of a sermon preached by Rev. W. G. Starr, of Norfolk, Va., upon the sin and folly of suicide. Two young women and a young man, who heard the sermons, confessed that they had determined to kill themselves, but had changed their minds after listening to the preacher.

M. E. S., Reedsburg, Wis. What is the meaning of Christ's remark about offenses (Luke 17: 2)?

It was a common phrase among the Jews of the time. It is as if we said "drowned like a dog." The offense in this case seems to be more than vexing or annoying a times carved in the shape of idols; in others they were cut down, carved and set up like totem-poles. When mentioned in such connection as that you quote they were identified with idolatrous worship. 3. We gather from Paul's description that new bodies will be provided (see I. Cor. 15: 35-44). Many theories have been advanced on the subject. One that has found some favor is that the body in the grave is never wholly destroyed but that a minute germ survives which becomes the basis of the new body.

R. H. N., Austin, Tex. I am in doubt about the miraculous conception of Christ. Would not the prophecies be fulfilled if we suppose him to have been of human origin, but endowed of God in the Spirit?

The difficulties in the way of that theory seem to us greater than those in the way of the orthodox doctrine. Can you conceive of such a life as that of Christ having a human origin? Would an ordinary man, living in an obscure place like Nazareth, suddenly emerge, preaching such doctrines as he did, stilling the tempest, feeding the multitude, making the blind see, healing until the attack was over. From the deck of the Minden Key saw, during the night of September 14, 1814, the bombardment of Fort McHenry. Walking the deck of the Minden in his anxiety, Key composed the song. He wrote it down on the back of a letter, and as soon as he got back to Baltimore he wrote it out in full.

Mrs. H. A. S., Egg Harbor City, N. J. I am impressed with a thought expressed by Rev. F. DeWitt Talmage, in your issue of December 4. He says: "The more foreigners you can get to immigrate into Christian lands, the sooner the world will be converted to Christ. Open your schools to them," etc., etc. Shall we, as a nation, "open our schools to them," and allow them the right to dictate what shall or shall not be taught there? Are we not catering too much to "our foreign element" when we consent to eliminate all trace of Christianity from our public schools, perhaps the only place where thousands of children ever hear that holy name except in courses?

The writer probably refers to the recent public school incident in New York, but she has apparently failed to notice that the Board of Education receded from its stand, and consented to the usual Christmas exercises in all districts except those in which Hebrews predominate.

H. E. B., Whitesboro, N. Y. How was it that Eleazar the son of Aaron entered the promised land when it was decreed that all that generation should die except Caleb and Joshua?

If you turn to the decree in Numbers 32: 11, 12 you will see that the sentence applied only to those who were twenty years old and upward when the people left Egypt. As Eleazar had two elder brothers, we must suppose that he was under twenty at the time of the Exodus. The direct statement is made in Num. 26: 65 that all were dead of the earlier generation at that time.

A. H., Minier, Ill. What proofs are there that there is a living God?

There is a presumption, to begin with, that the universe did not come into existence of itself. When you hold a watch in your hand you do not require any one to prove that there was a man who made it. When you come to examine the laws of the universe you discover evidence of intelligence and design, and the more you learn of those laws, the clearer the fact becomes that He who planned them must have had infinite wisdom. To conceive of such a Being as being any other than a living God is contrary to our intuitions.

EVERY now and then inquiries reach this office, from generously-inclined friends, for the proper legal designation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD charities. While the benevolent work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD extends over the whole world, its special charities are the Bowery Mission and our Children's Home. The corporate name of the Bowery Mission is as follows: "The Bowery Mission and Young Men's Home of New York City." The proper designation of the Children's Home is as follows: "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Nyack, New York." Both are duly incorporated and entitled to receive legacies.

brother; it is, rather, causing him to offend. A case in illustration might be where a weak brother (one of Christ's little ones) is making a strong fight to shake himself free of the liquor habit, and some stronger Christian deliberately leads him into temptation or puts temptation in his way, thus causing him to offend. Other examples will occur to you.

Reader, Sandusky, N. Y. Is it legally right for a minister of the Gospel from a foreign country who has not taken out his first naturalization papers to perform a marriage ceremony in this State of New York?

A case of this nature was decided lately in another State, the court holding the marriages performed under such conditions to be illegal. We know of no test case of the kind in New York, but while such marriages might possibly stand, it would be wiser to have the ceremony conducted by an American clergyman.

E. G. R., Cantril, Ia. 1. What did Agag mean by saying (I. Sam. 15: 32), "The bitterness of death is past"? 2. What are the groves referred to in Kings 16: 33 and elsewhere? 3. Will the same bodies we bury be raised at the resurrection?

1. He may have meant that as the king had allowed him to live the prophet would not kill him. Or perhaps that as a captive the worst of death was over for him. Is it important? 2. If you refer to the Revised Version, you will find that the word is there translated Asherah. The trees were some-the leper, raising the dead? Such a life we would expect to have a supernatural origin. This is apart from the statements of the Gospels and from Jesus' own declaration: "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father" (John 14: 9). When you consider the personality, the teaching and the works of Jesus, it should not be difficult for you to believe in his miraculous birth, on which rests the doctrine of the atonement.

L. H. S., Hildreth, Neb. What is a bucket shop?

A bucket shop is an office where people may gamble in fractional lots of stocks, grain or other things, that are dealt in on the regular exchanges, with this difference, that there is no delivering and no expectation or intention to deliver or receive the securities or commodities purchased. It is a place where one gambles on a small scale on the rise and fall of the market.

M. S. G., Warren County, Miss. Who wrote "The Star-Spangled Banner," and what was the occasion of its being written?

It was written by Francis Scott Key, September, 1814. He had gone on the ship Minden with a flag of truce to ask for the release of some friends who had been taken by the British during an attack on the City of Washington. Key found the British fleet ready to attack Baltimore. The Admiral agreed to release the prisoners, but compelled them and Key to remain

CONCERNING NEW-YEAR'S

Thoughts on the Past and Good Resolutions for the Future Awakened by the Advent of 1908

WHEN I was a little girl beginning to write compositions in the schoolroom, and finding the task the pleasantest that fell into the routine of the week, I once chose for my theme, "The Past, the Present and the Future." I still remember the amused smile on the face of the teacher as she glanced at my production. "Rather a large subject, don't you think?" she said, and her criticism was just.

Yet, at this moment, with the old year on the wane, and the New Year stepping in, I can think of no better topic than the one that allured me as a child of twelve. The past is always behind us, the future always in advance, the present all we actually possess. We are forever between two eternities.

In Rudyard Kipling's Recessional, he said in two strong lines:

To, all our pomp of yesterday
Is one with Nineveh and Tyre.

Stop to think of it! How far away, how remote, how out of reach is the hour before you went to bed last night! It is a bit of gold that has slipped out of your hands, not into the deep sea from whence it might be cast up on the shore, but into an inaccessible ravine, too steep and too dark for plummet to reach or searcher to explore. Yesterday has gone forever. Its effects remain. It passes on its toil and task, its laughter and tears to its following day, and that day, in turn, passes on its entire wealth or its meagre poverty to its succeeding to-morrow. We haven't yesterday, but we have had it. If it was light and sweet, if it was full of friendly words and deeds, if it brought us nearer to Christ and closer to our fellow men, it is still our own, although beyond our grasp. No one can rob us of precious memories, no one can take from us the dear love that in other days brightened our existence. As for the future, human life is uncertain, and we cannot be sure of any moment that is not yet ours. Nevertheless, we must build for the future in our individual lives and in planning for our children. To live intensely in the present with the motto, "Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might," is the secret of success in life, and no man or woman can hope to attain eminence anywhere who does not set the present in its proper place as more important than either past or future. When the time comes that people live more in the past than in the present, they may accept it as an evidence that they are growing old. Young people naturally see visions and forecast the future. They are springing forward eager and enthusiastic, always going on. The little lad tells you with pride that he is "going on ten," his birthday having occurred last week.

How long the distance used to be from one year to another! Twelve months seemed interminable, but that was when we were in the gay holiday of the teens. The years grew a little briefer, a little swifter in passing after we were married and the children began to arrive, and we were trying to pay for the farm, or establish the business. Some of us who are beyond the meridian remember very well when we looked upon thirty or forty as a venerable age. Some of us who now express irritation when obtrusive young people offer us superfluous attentions, as when a rosy-cheeked girl in the street-car presses a seat on one, with the words, "I cannot sit and let an old lady stand," or declines a seat with the intimation that it cannot be accepted from an old gentleman, remember very well how droll that irri-knew that the gallant heart had ceased to beat, I was thankful that the end had come, for he was one of those who had fought a good fight and finished his course, and kept the faith. Then I began to think how very, very thin the ranks were growing; how few were left of the men who, in the heat of youth, wore the blue or wore the gray in that mighty conflict which tested, as nothing else could, the mettle of this nation. One by one they are going, and will go until the last survivor has fallen into the last sleep. In the meantime, the bright years full of zest, full of elation, full of courage, full of hope, are hurrying onward, one by one. The colleges had eager youths in the class-rooms fifty years ago; a hundred years ago; they have just as many who are just as eager on their muster rolls to-day. History repeats itself.

Of course you will say, and say very justly, that the making of good resolutions at the New Year is somewhat futile because few of us keep the resolutions that we make. We start in with much earnestness to turn over our new leaf. All too soon we drift back into the old familiar folly, whatever it happen to be, that made our efforts abortive. One folly of this kind is the folly of imitating our neighbors in matters not essential. Another folly is in dropping our tasks too soon or taking hold of them too idly. Another is in seeing everything from the place where it affects ourselves. "Look not every man on his own things," is a good motto for the New Year. Another good one is, "Having done all to stand." We are not to give up to physical weakness or increasing infirmity, or ill-temper or envy or malice in the New Year, and if we are aware that we did so in the old, up with the flag of the good resolution, and down on the knees in prayer, that strength may not fail in keeping it. Let us wish one another a Happy New Year, and let us all do our best to make the year happier for all than any year they have known hitherto.

For a New Year

Here is a bit of poetry which is appropriate to any of us in beginning another year.

With every rising of the sun
Think of your life as just begun.
The past has shriveled and buried deep
All yesterdays. There let them sleep,
Nor seek to summon back one ghost
Of that innumerable host.
Concern yourself with but to-day:
Woo it and teach it to obey
Your will and wish. Since Time began
To-day has been the friend of man.
But in his blindness and his sorrow
He looks to yesterday and to-morrow.
You and To-day! A soul sublime
And the great pregnant hour of Time,
With God himself to bind the twain!
Go forth, I say; attain! attain!

tation used to appear to us in the long ago. Everything is relative. The youthful reporters who write for the daily papers constantly speak of accidents that happen to aged folk in their fifties. One reads between the lines that the young fellows who write are in their early twenties. A grandmother easily recalls a day when she was reproved by her mother for her flippancy in speaking of a friend as "quite old, over thirty." "My dear," said the mentor, "at thirty a man has not yet reached his prime."

Everything depends on the point of view. The years go rushing down a toboggan slide after we leave middle life. They march slowly up a hill until we are twenty-five.

It is curious to think of the unending procession of the centuries, year by year, sweeping on in single file; each like a veiled dervish, silently, steadily, onward they march. Looking backward we call them history; looking forward we call them prophecy. The other day, at Liberty, N. Y., there passed away after a long and weary siege of illness, borne with splendid fortitude, a soldier of the Grand Army, who was probably one of the youngest on either side to attain distinction in the Civil War. When I saw his name in the paper, and

By MARY McCRAE CULTER

AN hour before the evening service, Mr. Allan stepped out of his low window and went to the end of the piazza where Hollis was sitting. He had one of the church music-books in his hand, and when he reached her side he gave it to her, saying:

"Miss Hollis, I wish you would pick out some music for this evening's service. You know what the choir can sing, and so can choose better than I. If you will not help in one way, you see I will press you into service in another, and maybe after a while you will relent and will bring your voice and your skill, also, to my assistance."

The girl's heart leaped with triumph, not only because of this furtherance of her secret aims, but more because of the admiration which showed itself in his dark eyes, and in the pleading cadence of his voice. She took the book, determined that that evening's performance should give the choir service entirely into her control. While the young minister sat beside her and told her the subject of his sermon, she carefully selected and marked music which she knew the inexperienced organist would mangle fearfully, and cause both player and singers to fail completely.

"This music is familiar? You are sure?" Mr. Allan asked as she returned the book to him.

"I drilled the choir on it thoroughly last winter," she answered briefly, not deeming it necessary to inform him that the present choir was not the one that had learned the music in question.

With intense satisfaction she sat in a conspicuous place that evening and watched the faces and actions of the organist and choir after Mr. Allan handed them the list of hymns for the service, and saw that she had wrought the consternation which she had expected.

"If they try those pieces, they will break down on every one. If they ask Mr. Allan to change them, it will prove to him that Amy Conover is not capable of holding the organist's position. Either way it may turn out will be satisfactory to me," she thought as she watched them.

Up in the choir, this conversation was going on:

"Oh, dear! I can't play a single one of these pieces," Amy was saying.

"Look at Hollis Hayward's face," whispered Glenn Fraser, who, on account of his fine bass voice, was a member of the choir. "She's watching you girls, and she's enjoying your embarrassment. This is one of her tricks, I'll be bound. Let me see that list. Yes, this is with malice aforethought; she has planned to make us break down. Ah!"—with a sudden breath of relief—"we are saved. Our good angel has appeared, and our bad angel is doomed to disappointment. When did Kathleen Lawrence get home?"

"Kathleen!" cried Amy, in sudden relief. "Oh, the blessed girl! Go down after her, Glenn, and tell her to come and save our credit. She can play anything."

Glenn had left the platform before Amy had finished speaking, and a moment later he returned, followed by a graceful, sweet-faced girl to whom the choir gave rapturous greeting. Hollis bit her lips with vexation; then, meeting Glenn's mischievous gaze of perfect understanding, she turned her head quickly away, while the tell-tale blood mounted to cheek and brow.

"Kathleen Lawrence, of all people! How unlucky! I thought she was not due for two weeks yet. That settles everything—unless"—and her thoughts rambled off in search of desired possibilities.

"He and his wife and daughters had talked over the affairs of the church"

Mr. Allan had become aware of the unusual disturbance in the choir, and decided that some mistake had been made about the hymns. He was on the point of going to inquire, but at that moment Glenn Fraser brought the stranger up to the platform, and he saw that her coming had dispelled the difficulty. He had noted her the moment she entered the church, for Kathleen Lawrence attracted attention wherever she went.

The minister wondered whether this was the elder Miss Lawrence, then turned his attention to the services and announced the opening hymn. As he expected, the stranger took the stool, and at the first, firm touch of her hands upon the organ keys, he knew that his desired organist had come. There had not been such music in the Hawthorne church since his arrival, as there was that night.

As Miss Tilly Walker said, after meeting: "Everybody wants to sing when Kathleen plays. Some way she makes it so easy, and then everybody knows there is no danger of her breaking down. She's the best musician in this whole county—even though she never went to any conservatory."

Hollis slipped away without waiting to walk home with Mr. Allan, as had been her custom of late. She was afraid he would say something about the music, and she had not yet thought out her line of defense, or method of future procedure.

"My time will come yet," she said to herself defiantly. "Kathleen Lawrence shall not have everything her way this summer. Why couldn't she have waited another week before coming home?"

his plans with suspicion—a state of affairs which seemed to deepen as the weeks passed by. The Sunday for the quarterly communion in his church year came and went, without increase in conversions or church membership. Among the many young people of the community, the pastor felt there should have been some who had been influenced by his faithful work and earnest prayers, and because they did not come, he felt discouraged. Had this been the experience of his predecessors? he wondered. He got the church record book from Mr. Hayward, who was clerk, and studied its pages. The search was a discouraging

one. He found that, although several special efforts in the way of evangelistic meetings had been made at various times, there had been very little, if any, response on the part of those for whom the effort was made. About the only advance which he could find chronicled was in the matter of improving the manse, and renovating and redecorating the church. If he had been an older and a wiser man, he might have read some important things between the lines where these statements were recorded; but as he had never "remodeled and redecorated" a church, these reasons were lost on him.

He was studying gloomily over this book, the Monday morning after communion Sunday, when he heard a step upon the piazza, and, a moment later, Mr. Lawrence's voice asking for himself. He went at once to greet his caller, and invited him to enter.

"No, no! I haven't time this morning. I have only a minute or two to spare, and then I must finish my errands. My header broke down this morning, and I had to come over to town for repairs. While the smith is making them, I ran down here to see whether I could persuade you to go over and spend a few days with us, and see a genuine Kansas harvest. I don't suppose you ever saw a wheat-header back East, did you? It's worth going three miles to see, if you have not already made its acquaintance.

We have a houseful of hands over there now, and they are a lively set, I assure you; but the more, the merrier, you know; and we'll find something for you to eat, and some place to stow you away to sleep, without having to hang you up on a nail. So come along for a few days—or for the whole week, if you are willing. Throw anything you want to take along into a grip, and stick in a sermon or two in case you decide to stay with us until next Lord's Day. I'll be back in fifteen minutes. Will you go?"

"Indeed, I shall be glad to do so," the minister replied, his depression vanishing as if by magic. He hastened back to his room to pack a few things into a suit-case, and so great was his hurry that he forgot to close his door. As he worked, the tones of Hollis' voice floated from the sitting-room across the hall to his ears.

"Ma, Mr. Lawrence is going to take Mr. Allan over to his house to spend the

WANT THE MOTTO RESTORED

The Nation's Protest Against the Removal of "In God We Trust" is Steadily Growing

BY every mail, letters, in a constantly increasing volume, are coming to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from all parts of the Union, protesting against the removal from our coins of the time-honored motto "In God We Trust." As it is impracticable to print all of these communications (two pages were devoted to them in last week's issue), we give below extracts from a few, and acknowledge the others by printing the names of the writers. The whole of the original letters have been forwarded to Hon. Ollie M. James of Kentucky, Member of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., who lately introduced a bill providing for the restoration of the motto, and who will doubtless be able to use them to good advantage. We would urge all who take an interest in the movement for the restoration of the motto, and who have not already written to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to write briefly to Hon. O. M. James, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C. Public opinion is a mighty factor in a matter like the present, and every individual protest will help to swell the mighty tide that now seems to be rising.

Among the many hundreds of letters received are some of peculiar interest, representing as they do many signers to a single protest. Two hundred members of the W. C. T. U. of Riverside, Calif., unite in demanding the restoration of the motto. Mr. Isaac Hart, of Lake City, Fla., sends a protest against removal signed by fifty-three persons—the entire business community of the town. His letter closes with these words: "We hope that all parts of our country will arouse over the putting aside from our coins of the greatest of all names—that of God."

It is everywhere apparent in these letters that the great Christian heart of the nation has been deeply wounded by the effacement of the acknowledgment of God upon our coinage. "Does the head of the nation know how he has hurt the hearts of the Southern people by eliminating that motto?" asks a letter from Louisville, Ky. And the same inquiry is repeated from other sections. Indeed, there is not a single State unrepresented in this great far-reaching protest. Many of the writers condemn the removal as "a serious mistake," which has "grieved every true Christian in America." Rev. H. V. Kingsley, of Dial, W. Va., writes, in behalf of his entire congregation, protesting against "striking out our recognition of Almighty God in our moneyed system . . . and thereby inviting the withdrawal of that protection." Mr. H. R. L. Farrow, of Bryn Mawr, Pa., expresses the hope that "public opinion will be aroused to such an extent that Congress will order the motto restored." Many regard it as an indication of rebellion against God, which, as history abundantly shows, is fruitful of evil consequences. "We propose by one stroke to renounce allegiance to the King of kings and make ourselves the laughing-stock of the civilized world," writes a reader in Danville, Ky. A lady in Rossburg, O., emphasizes the conviction that the deliberate refusal to recognize God's protecting care over the nation may bring "severe judgments, as it has done in all ages." A reader in Lisbon, N. Y., says no one has the right to "interfere with our trust in God," and adds: "I am too old to learn of other trusts. Put back the motto; I want to see it every day." "We might as well eliminate Thanksgiving, and all acknowledgment of our dependence on God, time-honored and precious to all Americans," writes a friend in Albion, Ill.

Letters protesting against the removal of the motto and demanding its restoration, have been received this week from the following persons:

Their Church Home Destroyed

ON Sunday morning, November 24, fire destroyed the beautiful Congregational Church at Dorset, Vermont, thus removing one of the oldest church edifices in the State, and one in which the pastorate of Rev. P. S. Pratt, D. D., deceased, extended over a period of more than fifty years. None of the contents of the building could be saved. The little group of grief-stricken villagers and others from hillside homes gathered in the school hall for the Sunday morning service, where the pastor, Rev. Charles Carhart, spoke with deep emotion from Isaiah 64: 11: "Our holy and our beautiful house, where our fathers praised thee, is burned up with fire," and there were few dry eyes in the sympathizing audience.

THE MESSENGER

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE Apostle John, whose vocation it was to be the special witness to the divinity of Christ our Lord, and who was his special biographer as the Son of God, consciously or unconsciously brings out in the very beginning of his Gospel the immense contrast between Christ and his forerunner. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." It was the emphatic assertion of one who knew him in his Godhead. The words of the Preacher were probably familiar to him: "The Lord possessed me at the beginning of his way; the first of his works of old." (Prov. 8: 22, R. V., margin. See Rev. 3: 16, R. V.) "I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was" (see also vers. 24-31). How different was his first mention of John the Baptist! "There was a man sent from God, whose name was John." The One was God; the other was sent from God. He speaks of Christ as "the Life" who was "the Light of men." Life and Light! But John the Baptist "came for a witness, to bear witness of the Light, that all men through him might believe." "He was not that Light, but was sent to bear witness of that Light." "A man sent from God!" Only a messenger, but a messenger of the Most High God, speaking with the power and with the authority of him who sent him. Every man or woman who is really called to be an evangelist, is also a man or a woman sent from God, and no other has a commission from God to preach the Gospel. To how many who have been ordained of man will God say at the last, "This man or woman was sent by me?" "For who hath stood in the counsel of the Lord, that he should perceive his Word and hear it? . . . I sent not these prophets, yet they ran: I spake not unto them, yet they prophesied. But if they had stood in my counsel, then had they caused my people to hear my words, and had turned them from their evil way." (Jer. 23: 18, 21, 22, R. V.) John the Baptist came straight from the presence of God to the multitude, and he did cause the people to hear God's words, and he did turn them from their evil way; this was the proof of his ministry. John bare witness of him, of Christ, before he proclaimed him as present; "and cried, saying, This was he of whom I spake, He that cometh after me is preferred before me, for he was before me. And of his fulness have all we received, and grace for grace." Not only was God's Messiah coming to bring grace and truth; he had already been communicating his fulness to man. Every man of the Old Testament who was saved, was saved through the coming Messiah. The law was given by Moses; but the law never saved a single sinner; "grace and truth came by Jesus Christ" (John 1: 15, 17). This was the kind of preaching which God sent to the Jews of his time by John the Baptist. He had nothing to say of the glory of a coming kingdom after the pattern of this world's royalty, nothing of pomp or regal state, of military power or gorgeous display; nothing of a revived monarchy, similar to that of Solomon of old. No, his message was of "grace" for the sinner, the "sinful nation," the "people laden with iniquity" (Isa. 1: 4), and "truth" for whomsoever would repent, because the kingdom of heaven was at hand. And he told distinctly who it was that should come to set up this kingdom of grace and truth. "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him." The Messiah had come to introduce to them their God. It was in effect the same message as in Heb. 1: 1, 2: "God, who at sundry times, and in divers manners, spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son."

LIFE'S TRUE CENTRE *

HOW can a man overcome the evil tendencies of his own nature and the temptations by which he is surrounded? To be a good man, to be living on a high plane, to be in the world, yet free from its stain and defilement—how many have sought earnestly for the solution of that problem! Teaching, good resolutions, systems of philosophy, have all been tried, but success has only been partial and never permanent. The earnest seeker is driven to plead for mercy and forgiveness, encouraged by the thought: "He knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust." The vivid sketch Paul gives in the seventh chapter of Romans of the man who could not do the things that he would, but did the things he hated, is a portrait that would stand for a host of seekers after God. It is this condition that is met in Christ. He came to bring the human into contact with the divine. It was to give the reinforcement to the spiritual within us that we need that he gave his life here. This is the secret of the overcoming life. The poor struggling man dragged down by his environment, yet intensely desiring to live the godly life, is encouraged to continue the fight in which he has been so often worsted. He is promised new help. A new source of strength is provided for him. Like a man sitting at the base of a mountain he has been pleading that God would carry him over the obstacle. Christ comes to him and bids him try again. God will not carry him over, but he will give him the strength he needs, if he will climb. Or he is in a boat becalmed and longing to cross the lake. Christ bids him raise the sail and God will fill it. Infinite strength is placed at his disposal. The only condition is that he shall use his own strength relying on the help that will be given him. It was not possible for Christ to make this clear to his disciples. No one fully understands it even now. But the fact is proved by experience. The leper is to show himself to the priest. What is the use? he knows that the leprosy is still in his frame. But as he goes he is cleansed. How close to us, how near this power is Christ showed by his simile of the vine: "I am the vine, ye are the branches." The source of life is not in ourselves, but in him. The sap that runs through our being comes from him. The power to serve, the fruit-bearing quality is not in the branches, it comes from the vine. This is the union of the human with the divine that is the secret of victory. We have a part in it, because our powers are energized and vivified by the divine power. He is in us and in his strength we triumph.

Which for You?

SOMEBODY'S working for Jesus all the bright day through; Somebody's working for Jesus—say, are you? Somebody's working against him, saying he is not true; Somebody's working against him—say, are you? Short are the days and seasons and there is work to do. Some working for, some against him; which will it be for you? Where do you stand, my brother? Where do you stand, my friend? For with every earthly journey, there cometh a journey's end. BELAH L. INGRAM.

Why John the Baptist Was Great

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

AS this is the only lesson on John the Baptist in this six months' series on the life of Jesus, we may well recall the whole life of the man behind the witnessing here described. Indeed, the most important thing about any witnessing is the character of the witness. The lips must be backed up by the life, if their utterances are to be trusted. John was twice declared to be "great." It makes a difference who gives that witness. Who did? First, the angel that promised this child to his parents (Luke 1: 15). He said: "He shall be great in the sight of the Lord." And later, when John had fulfilled the angel promise Jesus proclaimed him "great" (Matt. 11: 11). That settles it. The most reasonable thing any mortal can do is to accept the word of Christ as final on any question on which he has spoken. But what made John truly great? That is a practical question, to answer which we must study his whole life.

1. John the Baptist was great because he and his parents fulfilled God's plan for his life. Isaiah and Malachi foretold the coming of John the Baptist as a second Elijah, careless of comforts, but full of courage, a herald of Christ, who should go before him crying: "Prepare the way of the Lord" (Isa. 40: 3, 4; Mal. 4: 5). And when the time had almost come, the angel Gabriel foretold to the aged Elizabeth, who thought that her home was never to be gladdened with a child, that she was to give the world this promised forerunner of Jesus: "Thou shalt have joy and gladness, and many shall rejoice at his birth. For he shall be great in the sight of the Lord," etc. (Luke 1: 14-17). His mother and father, and the child himself, all worked with God to the utmost to fulfil that wonderful promise.

God's Plan for Life

Do not forget that every child's life is a plan of God, and that a part of that "plan" is that you should be good and do good. Can we all be great as well as good? Yes; by linking our names with Christ as John did, they shall become immortally glorious in his reflected light, in heaven if not on earth. When Paul Bliss, the son of the lamented songwriter, P. P. Bliss, was seven years old, he came to a realization that his father had left behind him a great name. The child asked a friend the question: "Can you tell me what made my papa great?" "Yes," was the reply, "your father wrote many beautiful songs, which taught people how to love Jesus. And loving Jesus made them so happy, they loved your father for helping them to know how to love Jesus. Many people loved your father for this, and so he was great in the love of others." If John the Baptist had not been the humble servant of Jesus, we should none of us know that such a man had ever lived. Even on earth those whose honors abide are the good who were also "good for something." Who knows the names of the richest men of John's time? Even the public officers of that day are not generally known to the people of to-day, except those whose names were linked with Christ as friends or enemies. Can you name any ruler of that age, except the Herods and Pilate and others who were some way related to Christ? It is the good that are honorably remembered by God and man.

A Spirit-Filled Life

2. John the Baptist was "great" also because he was filled with the right spirit. What a delusion lies in the name "spirit" as applied to that which comes into human nature not to strengthen, but to weaken! Of thirty-two young men examined in a recent year in New York City for a cadetship only nine were physically sound. John was an abstainer all his life. There were "Nazarenes" who took the pledge only for a limited period; but he pledged perpetual abstinence from all that could intoxicate. He did not stop, as some people do, with barring out the wrong "spirit"—he also admitted the right Spirit. And let neither parents nor children overlook the fact that he was born of the Spirit, as was Jeremiah also (Jer. 1: 9), at the very beginning of his life. He was consecrated from the cradle, as every child might be if parents were prayerful and faithful. The first choice between right and wrong may be a right one, as surely as the second one may be, or the hundredth.

Obedience Pledged

Mr. Macfarlane, many years a missionary in the South Sea Islands, tells of the cannibal warriors who, when converted, said: "We have been soldiers of the devil. We are now soldiers of Jesus Christ. Tell us what he would like us to do." Tell them that Christ would not like them to go to a place, and they say, "Then I won't go"; that he would not like to hear them using certain language, and the reply is, "Then I won't say that any more"; that he would not like to see them doing so and so, "Then I won't do it," is the quick response.

3. John was "great" because he was also a fearless "voice" against sin and for salvation by the cross. John, having been foretold by two prophets and by Gabriel, the prince of the angels, and being descended on both sides from Aaron, the brother of Moses, and belonging not only to God's chosen people, but also to the Levites, the highest in rank of them all, might naturally have been proud of his blood and station, and his superior morality and spirituality might have added to his self-esteem. But when his moral and spiritual childhood had ripened into young manhood, and he had entered on his appointed work as a preacher of righteousness, though great popularity as a preacher to unprecedented crowds of rich and poor again offered occasion for self-regard, he replied to those who thought he must be the Messiah, "I am only the voice of one crying in the wilderness" (John 1: 19-23). That saying is characteristic of John's whole life, and of all who in the Bible speak and write for God. They all stand before us, as Joseph before Pharaoh, saying, "It is not in me; God shall give you an answer of peace." (See II. Sam. 23: 2; Isa. 1: 10 (repeated twenty times); Jer. 1: 4; Ezek. 1: 3; 3: 10, 11 (repeated sixty times); Dan. 9: 2; 10: 9; Hos. 1: 1; Joel 1: 1, etc.)

John's Humility

The humility of John the Baptist comes out in deeper lines when, being asked about his baptism of repentance, he answered that a greater baptism of the Spirit would be given them by the Master whom he heralded, whose sandals he, as his lowliest servant, was not worthy to unlouse. Not worthy to be his servant, yet he dared to call himself "the friend of the Bridegroom" in another unconscious picture of his self-forgetfulness. When the crowds, whom John the Baptist had gathered, left him to hear Jesus, and John's jealous friends complained, he answered, comparing himself to the bridegroom's friend, who goes before him to arrange all things with the bride's family: "He that hath the bride, the church, is the Bridegroom, Christ, and I, who am only the friend of the Bridegroom, delight to get away into the shadow and rejoice greatly because of the Bridegroom's voice, talking with his happy bride. He must increase and I must decrease" (John 3: 25-30). Why does not some great artist picture this wonderful conception, the masterpiece of humility?

Few men ever become great enough to retire so early in life and so cheerfully from the front of the stage when the good of the cause requires it. It is such humble men who are willing to be forgotten that the world will not forget. And even Though they may forget the singer,

They will not forget the song.

To be a "voice" for God that shall be heard, whether we are "heard of" or not—let that be our Christian ambition. A certain man used to pray now and then in prayer-meeting, but in so low a voice that no one could tell what he said. The pastor thought it was because he had a feeble voice, until one day he stepped into his store and heard his orders to his clerk ring out all through the store: "John, bring up that fifty pounds of flour." "Alas!" said the pastor, "he can only whisper for God, but in business he has a mighty voice."

Lord, speak to me that I may speak

In living echoes of thy tone:

As thou hast sought so let me seek

Thy erring children lost and lone.

Oh, fill me with thy fulness, Lord,

Until my very heart o'erflow

In kindly thought and glowing word,

Thy love to tell, thy praise to show.

4. John the Baptist was "great" because he was faithful unto death. He who first of New Testament voices pointed forward to the cross, was himself the first of Christ's disciples to suffer death for witnessing to the truth. That he was a man of like passions with us we see when, having been arrested for condemning the sins of King Herod and his queen, he sent from the discouragement of his suffering for righteousness' sake to ask Christ, "Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?" Christ did not break the bruised reed, but strengthened it by new displays of his divine power to heal: "Go tell John the things that ye do see and hear." And so the hero, with quickened faith, lived on until the hate of Herodias caused his execution through the rash promise of a drunken king to a lewd dancing girl. First of New Testament martyrs he had gone to his crown, leaving the whole world the legacy of a noble example and the sublime message, "Behold the Lamb of God"—a message that transforms death into a home-going for all whose sins Christ has borne away.

A little girl lay weak and ill, and the mother and doctor bent over her anxiously. By and by the doctor turned to go, and something in his face drew the mother to leave her darling and follow him out of the room. The doctor had a hard thing to tell her—he knew that it would almost break her heart. "I am sorry to tell you," he said very gently, "that your child can live only a few hours." "My Father, this is thy will for me," she whispered brokenly, and then she turned and went upstairs to the quiet room. With a brave effort she tried to smile as she stood by the bedside. "Darling," she said, "do you know Jesus wants you to go to him? You won't be afraid, will you?" The girl looked up in her mother's face with a puzzled expression. "Is it my own Jesus who wants me, mother?" The mother's tears would not be hidden any longer. "Yes, darling," she answered with a sob of anguish. "Why, mother! if it is my own Jesus, I'm not afraid—not one bit afraid." "Even so, come, Lord Jesus," in life or death to us all.

A Golden Text Story

A young man employed as a clerk in a telegraph office, who had been led to see that he was a sinner, went to the office one morning, saying: "God be merciful to me a sinner." The clerk at the machine gave him his seat, and he read a strange message. There was first the name and residence, then followed these words: "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world, in whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of his grace." And then followed the name of the sender. The explanation of it was this: The telegram was sent to a servant girl in distress about her sins who had a brother who was a Christian. She had written him asking the great question: "What must I do to be saved?" He answered with the telegram, which brought her to the light, and proved to the operator a telegram from heaven.

MODERN REVELATIONS*

HOW did God communicate with his ancient prophets? Abraham heard an audible voice, we are told, and he answered audibly (Gen. 22: 1). Samuel, too, as a child, heard the same voice (1 Sam. 3: 4). In other instances God spoke in dreams and it would appear that Isaiah, Jeremiah and the prophets must have been familiar with other modes of communication. In one instance when God spoke to Jesus, the people thought it was thunder (John 12: 29). John heard "a great voice as of a trumpet" (Rev. 1: 10). It is more than possible, however, that in many cases the voice was heard only by the spirit and was merely a thought powerfully impressed upon the mind. The servant of God meditating on the events of his time, perceived the need of warning, and knowing well what was the righteous course, proclaimed, "Thus saith the Lord." A man needs to be very sure of his ground before he presumes to speak in God's name. Yet it is easy to understand how such a declaration may be justified. A man may know God so well, may have lived in such close communion with him, as to claim God's authority for some special message that he feels called to deliver.

Obviously the conviction must be very clear and positive to justify any man in contending that his words are the words of God. The statement made from pulpit or platform that God wishes this or that causes a reverent listener to shudder. A minister stated very recently that God wished a collection to be taken up. He may have done so, but the doubt that arose in the minds of some reverent persons in the audience when the assertion was made should be a reproof to all who presume to speak in God's name.

Far be it from us to say that in these days God does not speak to his servants; but every man who knows himself and the possibility of self-deception, will hesitate to represent his voice as the voice of God. Our duty is to live so close to him, to study so humbly and carefully his character, to keep habitually so receptive a mood, that God will reveal himself and his will to us. Such revelation is possible, as it has always been, but it comes to the mind that is not seeking self-glorification, but to him who listens as a child to the inaudible voice of God.

Books Received

CROSS CURRENTS, The Story of Margaret, by Eleanor H. Porter, is a delightful book which will be enjoyed by young and old alike. It appears at a most appropriate time, because of the increased interest in the question of child labor. Reared in luxury, Margaret Kendall suddenly finds herself placed in the environment of New York's slums. Her life among the sweat-shops and on the streets, deprived of every influence which works for good, is a true portrayal of the other side of our American life. It is a wonderfully striking picture, but the author, while showing what child labor really is, has also given a happier side, for in the life of this girl is exemplified what heredity will and can do. Readers of this journal who remember the story of Margaret, which appeared originally in these pages, will have a special interest in this handsome and attractive volume which gives the fascinating tale a new setting, with fine illustrations. Pp. 207, cloth cover. Price, $1. W. A. Wilde Co., Boston and Chicago, Publishers.

The Virgin Birth of Christ. A series of lectures delivered by James Orr, M.A., D.D. At this time, when the doctrine of the virgin birth has been assailed by eminent scholars with new vigor, the publication of these lectures by the stalwart Scottish divine is very timely. The orthodox believer will be glad to see a defense so vigorous by a scholar so able. There are in all eight lectures, with an appendix of opinions of theologians in France and Germany. Pp. 301. Price $1.50. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

The Boys' Life of Christ, by William Byron Forbush. An invaluable book as a present for a boy. It has already reached its second edition and promises to live on to many more. It is a presentation with such background as study and travel can furnish of Jesus as a hero. It shows him from birth to resurrection, in the character that a boy loves, and makes him more real than the heroes of history. There is no attempt in it to teach theology or philosophy, but to present the character of Jesus on the heroic side. The boy who reads this book will ask further information and will go to the Gospels for it. Pp. 356. Price $1.25. Published by Funk & Wagnalls Company, New York.

Answered Prayers

Reader. "For all God's goodness I thank Him, and especially for many answers to my prayers. I am praying for the full physical restoration of a dear loved one, and for the spiritual redemption of another. I am trusting in the promise: 'Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name,' etc."

Mrs. St. J. "I can truly say God has answered prayer for me. If we love and trust him, as a little child loves and trusts an earthly parent, and give ourselves into his hands as clay to mould and fashion according to his will, and say from the depth of the heart, 'Thy will be done!' we have nothing to fear."

S. E. M., Iowa. "How easy it seems for God to answer the true and humble prayer of faith, even better than we dared to ask! He has answered many prayers for unworthy me for health and for financial help, and has lifted the burden of care because I asked him."

Our fifteen years' experience in handling Drainage Bonds warrants the statement that no class of bonds is more promptly paid; the security usually doubles or triples in value during the life of the bonds. The farmer pays his Drainage Tax more cheerfully even than his School Tax, because Drainage is a direct benefit to his land. One bushel of corn extra per annum per acre will, as a rule, cover the Drainage Taxes, while Drainage increases his crop 10 to 100-fold.

Questions and Answers

D. C., Homer, N. Y. Are the Bermuda Islands much of a winter resort for Americans? How often do steamers run?

Yes; hundreds of Americans, especially those whose lungs cannot stand the rigors of our northern climate, go there every winter. They are only forty-five hours' sail from New York.

D. F. H., Louisville, Ky. What was the first engagement in which regulars took part in the Mexican war?

On April 25, 1846, Captain Thornton was with a small body of troops which was sent out to scout from a point near Matamoras, on the Rio Grande. Thornton and his men were attacked and captured.

R. D. J., Peniel, Tex. Can you give me the names of the French Huguenots who came to America and what States they settled in?

It would be impossible to give any list of names, as several thousand Huguenot refugees came to the American colonies. Henry Martyn Baird has written several standard books on the Huguenots. The Rise of the Huguenots in France, The Huguenots and Henry of Navarre and a two-volume work on The Huguenot Immigration to America. This latter work gives the names of several hundred who came to America. There is a society in New York composed of the descendants of Huguenots. The Huguenots settled in South Carolina, in Boston and other places in Massachusetts, in New London, Conn.; in Staten Island, N. Y.; New York City, New Rochelle, N. Y., and other coast towns.

M. F. A. S., Chippewa Falls, Wis. How is the name Carnegie pronounced?

It is given in the New Standard Dictionary as "Car-ne-gi," first syllable accented.

J. M., New Brunswick, N. J. All history is full of examples of nations and kingdoms, which, faithful at first, grew arrogant and "forgot God," with the inevitable tragic result. Babylon, Nineveh, Israel, Egypt, have their counterpart in later times.

J. E. W., Highland, N. Y. Is it right for a Christian to deal in railroad and industrial stocks and bonds?

If by dealing you mean for sale and actual delivery of the stocks, bonds or other goods, we reply, Yes. Dealing in margins, without delivery, is simply gambling.

S. R. T., Florence, Colo. Is there any passage which teaches or implies that knowing and believing on Jesus secures everlasting life?

Yes, there are many. Among the most direct is Christ's own statement to Nicodemus (John 3: 16). In the same chapter there is another direct statement (John 3: 36), and there are many in the New Testament, which you would do well to look up for yourself.

M. A. P., Jordan, N. Y. Can a Christian or a church conscientiously light house or church with electricity, knowing that someone must work on Sunday to furnish the light?

If it weighs on your conscience, then the proper thing is to light with something else. Gas production also involves Sunday work. Are you quite certain that electricity does not demand the minimum of Sunday labor after all? Besides, light, whether in house or church, is a necessity, and "works of necessity and mercy" are permissible.

J. E., Sharpsburg, Pa. When was Neal Dow born, and where was his field of work?

He was a noted temperance reformer, born at Portland, Me., 1804. Was the author of the famous "Maine Law." Lectured and organized in many States. Was Brigadier-General of Volunteers in the Civil War. Died 1897.

R. S., Brooklyn, N. Y. Who were the Karaites or Samaritans?

They were a small remnant of the Sadducees, "the Protestants of Judaism," formed into a sect by Anan-ben-Daniel in the eighth century. They rejected the rabbinical traditions and the Talmud, and accepted the Scriptures alone. The origin of their name is uncertain. Some of the sect exist in the Crimea, Poland and Turkey.

Reader, Sioux Falls, Iowa. Was the Priscilla of Longfellow's poem, "The Courtship of Miles Standish," a real person?

Yes; her name was Priscilla Mullines. Governor Bradford wrote out a list of those who came over on the Mayflower in 1620. In it the following occurs (we print it in the old spelling): "Mr. William Mullines, and his wife, and 2 children, Joseph and with their coming exile and captivity. They were secure, trusting that Egypt would protect them from the Assyrians, but Isaiah warned them against such trust, and by walking naked and barefoot showed them how they would be carried away prisoners to Babylon.

J. B., Milwaukee, Wis. 1. What is the Hebrew population of New York City? 2. How long has the United Hebrew Charities been aiding the poor, and how many beneficiaries has it had annually, on the average?

1. Between 600,000 and 700,000. 2. The organization is thirty-three years old and is one of the most efficient that has ever

Egyptians, not their misfortunes and defeats. There were many calamities which we know from secular history befell Egypt, which are not mentioned on the monuments. Scholars tell us, however, that the fact of Menephtah having lost his eldest son in some sudden manner, may be gleaned from the monuments. Exodus tells us how he lost him.

Dr. Bentley, Montgomery, Minn. 1. How can a miracle take place in a government of immutable law? 2. Are we really taught to hate father and mother as stated in Luke 14: 26?

1. God for his own purpose may suspend the operation of his laws. We call them immutable because we have never known them to change, but that does not prove that they have never changed. It is a matter of experience, and we should not set our experience as being a guide for all time. There may be spiritual laws which God keeps in his own control that override or alter the natural laws we know. Miracles do not happen in our experience; in other words, are not common. But if they were common they would cease to serve their purpose. 2. The word is extreme, as you will see by the parallel passage Matt. 10: 37, 38. The meaning is simply that the father or mother who tries to prevent a soul following Christ must be opposed. Any disciple having the alternative thrust upon him of obeying Christ or a father must choose the former, and in proportion as he is driven, necessarily resists the father, a course that might grow to hate if persistent. Christ meant, as the context shows, that he was to be preferred above every one, which is a reasonable requirement.

Mrs. M. H., Bowling Green, Ky. Where in the Bible is the following Scripture to be found: "The Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou putteth thine hand unto"?

See Deut. 15: 10, 18; also 16: 15.

C. B., Warren, Mass. Is the magic lantern a modern invention?

No; some antiquaries claim that it was devised by Roger Bacon, in A.D. 1260, but it is generally thought that it was the invention of Athanasius Kircher, who died in 1680.

J. G., New York City. Is there any account of a prophet being required to walk barefoot? What was it intended to teach?

The instance was that of Isaiah, and is described in the twentieth chapter of his prophecies. It was to impress the people

The Society's embarrassment is only temporary; it will undoubtedly soon be enabled to resume operations.

MY FRIEND THE "VEILED LADY"

A Bright American Woman Describes for The Christian Herald her Visit to a Wealthy Turkish Home

By EVELYN CLARK MORGAN

THE mysterious fascination with which tradition and romance have clothed the veiled women of the East is difficult to shake off. I find myself gazing at the shadowy forms that pass me in the streets in the vain hope that an elusive pin may cause the yasmak to drop aside, or that a kindly breeze may lift the veil and disclose the beauty which imagination pictures beneath its concealing folds.

If my wish were granted, I should probably be quickly disillusioned. The limpid eyes that peer through the apertures in the veil are often lighted by the fires of disease. The unveiled face of an Eastern woman is generally a pallid one, for the "white plague" is frightfully prevalent among women who are pardah (veiled). For all that, the East holds us captive, and we long to know more of the women whose forms we see indistinctly outlined through the latticed window or balcony.

I had scarcely expected to see a Turkish interior of the higher class, but the unexpected happened. I was invited by a Turkish woman to visit her at her villa. To the fact that the little veiled lady was a broadminded woman, traveled and cultured far beyond the generality of her countrywomen, and to the additional fact that in life aboard ship acquaintance quickly ripens into friendship, I am indebted for the entree to a Turkish home, the most exclusive and impenetrable of places.

The day and hour were appointed for my visit to Madame R—. An afternoon train carried me to the suburban town where she lives. Her English governess met me at the station, and we entered the satin-lined vehicle that had been sent to meet me. It was a garrison town through which we passed, and some of the groups we met were characteristic. A troop of infantry came marching past; then a cavalry officer on a fine mount. A caravan of camels bore haughtily down upon us, like a vision from the desert. With heads disdainfully high, they strode on in their loose, disjointed way, as if too proud or too patient to acknowledge their burden a grievous one. Herds of cattle and goats claiming more than their share of the road; sand-carts, in which were stowed more men, woman and children than would have been possible, except that such inconvenient members as arms and legs were dangling over the sides of the cart, and encroaching sometimes as far as the donkey's ears; family parties making for the town where, if the husband would ensure peace, he must purchase at the bazaar gowns of equal gorgeousness for his four wives, and "Turkish delight" (sweetmeats) enough for each mother's child to have a portion.

Interesting as the route was, it was not long, and we soon entered the villa grounds. The very architecture of an Eastern house stands for seclusion. The windows and doors of town houses are screened and country ones are shut in behind high walls. Privacy is the his friends, who are not invited or expected to enter the family residence.

In the case of my hostess, I fancied I could see, even in the exterior appearance of the villa, evidences of the modernized and advanced ideas of its mistress. The grounds were surrounded by high walls, but doors and windows opened freely upon the garden, abloom with clematis and oleanders. Ascending the marble steps, and entering the central room, I was met by Mme. R—, unveiled now and looking pretty and cool in a flowered muslin gown. She ushered me into a small reception room. Its appointments were dainty in the extreme. Gauzy draperies hung at the windows and doors, and besides the divans that bordered the room, there were delicately carved chairs and tables inlaid with mother-of-pearl.

In this room we found a friend of Mme. R—, a young Turkish wife and mother. She was plump and pretty, but her face had the pallor of the Eastern woman. While she knew no English (finding it too difficult, she said), she spoke French faultlessly. After some general conversation, a maid appeared carrying a tray on which were tall, slender-stemmed, gilded glasses containing sherbet. This was not an ice or even an iced drink, but a sirup-like concoction. Then the maid glided noiselessly in again, this time bringing real Turkish coffee in cups of infinitesimal size, resting in gold-enameled holders. She served it from a tabourette. At intervals of half an hour refreshments continued to be served.

Mme. R—, whose early education was obtained through English governesses, and who is educating her own children in the same way, has mastered the language sufficiently well to have written a Turkish love story in English. I asked to see the book and it was brought, the conversation then turning upon the condition of Turkish women, and subsequently upon marriage and divorce.

I spoke of a group I had met along the road in Syria, each one carrying parcels and singing as they walked. I had been told it was a bridegroom's family, who, at his command, had been to the neighboring town to purchase wedding garments for the bride, and for all of her foundation stone of family life. The houses are planned with a view to concealing the inmates. There is usually a court with a stairway in one corner. At the top of the flight, a blank wall confronts one and a passage way leads aside to the central room above the court. Doors are seen on all sides of the large room—doors that are only opened at the master's bidding; for the Turk and the Egyptian jealously guard the women of their households. Screened roof-gardens are common in the country, where there is naturally a little more freedom. There is a gentlemen's reception room in the garden, where the master of the house receives

The Mirrors of Life

TEXT: James 1: 23, R.V.—“He is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a mirror”

IT is a strange fact that most people know little of their physical appearance. The shrewd Scottish poet's desire is familiar to us all—

O wad some power the giftie gie us
To see ourselves as others see us.

But the power he invoked never made the gift. No man ever sees himself as he is seen either by his friends or by his enemies. When looking at ourselves we nearly always have blurred spectacles. Sir Anthony Vandyke, like other great portrait painters, used his own face for a model. But it is very likely the picture was not true to life. Queen Elizabeth bade the court artist omit the shadows from his picture of her face; the “shadows” being wrinkles that a straw might have been laid in. She had not the courage of Cromwell, who told the artist to paint him as he was, and not leave out the warts. Most of us want to look better than we are, and we often deceive even ourselves.

Self-Revelation

I once heard a great speaker give a humorous description of how he first saw himself as others saw him. Like most of us, up to that time he never knew how he looked. But one day a friend took him to visit “the Hall of a Thousand Mirrors.” When he went into this palace, he found the floors, the ceilings, the walls, all composed of looking-glasses. In these thousand mirrors he saw his own face and body reflected in a thousand different places. He saw every motion and gesture repeated from every angle and learned how he appeared fullface and sidewise, and he was unpleasantly astonished. “What!” he soliloquized; “do I look like those people? Do I act like those people? Well, one fact is certain: other people may like me; but I could never learn to like myself.” The easiest place in all the world for an average man to kill his egotism and vanity would be for him occasionally to visit a “Hall of a Thousand Mirrors,” where he can see himself as others see him.

The figure of my text implies that we are as unconscious of our faults of character as we are of our physical defects. As the man vain of his outward appearance is reproved by his mirror, so the man proud of his character is reproved when he looks into God's Word. But he, like the other, is prone to forget the revelation, and goeth his way, forgetting what manner of man he is. This is unfortunate, because we might remedy the defects of our character if we studied them and sought God's help.

There are other mirrors that help us to get a true estimate of ourselves, and I want to point out, this morning, how we may use them for our self-improvement. In the first place, I want you to carefully examine the reflections we may see in the looking-glasses held before our faces by the loving hands of our best and tenderest and dearest friends. It is not by any means a pleasant mirror to look at. Somehow many of us are deceived by the idea that friends above all mankind should think that our faces are perfect faces, and our natures perfect natures; but that is unreasonable. The true friend by intimate association may find virtues in us hidden from the eyes of the rest of the world, but he also finds imperfections in us which the world does not see. Then the true friend proves his affection by pointing out to us those defects, and warning us against the disasters that may come from them. Wise is the man, and the woman, and the child who heed the warnings spoken by those they love.

Maternal Perception

Those warnings began to come to us way back in our childhood days, when we were surrounded by our brothers and sisters. We now live in a great big world, where we have hundreds, perhaps thousands, of acquaintances. We have daily and hourly dealings with our fellow men. But I want to tell you that in all your business and domestic career as a mature man, the besetting sins of your life are not more self-evident to your friends than they were to your father, and especially to your mother, when you played with your brothers and sisters in the nursery. You can feel that loving maternal eye now boring straight into your heart and finding the flaws there. Even now you can hear her say, “John, the reason you took that big apple from your little sister is because you are selfish, and that is the besetting sin you must fight all your life.” Or she says, “John, you are naturally deceitful.” “John, that was the act of a coward.” “John, the difficulty about you is, you are vain and jealous. You hate to hear any one else praised. You are not satisfied unless every one is praising you.” Though years have passed since your mother uttered those words, yet you know she placed her finger upon the weakest part of your nature. To-day, though she is dead, you know that she did her duty to you by showing you your reflection in the looking-glass.

Flattering Reflections

Time passed, and you entered the great wide world, and you began to make a success. Then false mirrors were held up to deceive you. There gathered about you a lot of sycophants and social vampires. These toadies praise you and fawn over you and flatter you. When they are away from you they make fun of you and talk about your weaknesses. An old Spanish proverb says, “The absent are always wrong.” So you are always wrong to them when you are absent. But when these hangers-on are with you they have nothing but words of praise for you and your wonderful deeds. Yet, thank God, though there are many who talk against you when you are absent, there are a few noble friends who will criticize your faults to your face. They will come up and lay their hands lovingly on your shoulder, and say, “Charlie, I would not do that.” Or they say, “Charlie, you have an evil habit on you now, and it is eating all the honesty and nobility and purity out of your heart, and you must stop, or you will ruin yourself.” You may laugh off those warnings and forget them. Or you may get angry at your true friends. But the friends who are lifting the looking-glass before you and showing your imperfections are your true friends. Will you heed these warnings? Are all the glorious opportunities of your life to be ruined by that flaw which your friends have pointed out, but which you neglect to rectify?

An Enemy's Caricature

But there is another reflecting mirror held up before our eyes. That is the mirror with which our enemies delight to show our delinquencies to ourselves and to the world. It is a mirror into which most of us look with flashing eye and flushed cheek. But it is a reflecting mirror which ought to be as helpful for our moral and spiritual development as the one which our friends uplift. This mirror has a way of magnifying and intensifying our weaknesses. Like the caricature, it has a way of making prominent the flaws of our nature, and yet at the same time making it very plain for whom the portrait was intended.

These enemies do with the reflecting mirrors what William Hogarth did with his brush and pen. Have you ever been in the museums, where they had one room filled with concave and convex mirrors? You stand before one mirror and you seem to be a little short, fat man, about four feet high and weighing at least four hundred pounds. Then you look into another mirror, and instead of being a little short, fat man, now you will be twelve feet tall and about as wide as a match. Yet tall and thin, short and fat, you can see in those concave and convex mirrors the same eyes, lips, hands and hair. So our enemies in life take us and pull us out or shove us in, and twist us all out of shape, in order to magnify our faults; but though they expose our errors with unfailing skill, we still retain enough of our original selves to let the world know who we are and what we have done. And to-day, for our own benefit, they are lifting up the reflecting mirrors for us to have a good look at our errors and imperfections.

Past Failures

But there is still another way in which we can see our reflections in the mirrors of our imperfect lives. That is when we stand surrounded by the tragedies and the misfortunes resultant from the mistakes of our past. These misfortunes have their stories to tell, just the same as successes have their stories to tell. Though some men may achieve success in spite of glaring faults in their make-up, yet few men ever come to failure unless that failure is the result of some folly or sin, which, if it had been discerned in time, could have been rectified. And the man who is not willing to see his faults by his failures, is a man who is blind indeed, and who will not be taught by the sternest and yet best of all teachers.

Here, for instance, is a little child. He will persist in playing with fire. One day, out in the back yard near to the farm, he is gathering the leaves and starts them in a flame. The farm-hand gets there just in time to scatter the leaves and save all the hay which had been stored away in the loft. Next day, the boy is playing with matches in the nursery, and, in a flash, a whole box goes off; but the older sister throws them out of the window in time to save the lace curtains. The mother has warned the little boy and told him the danger. But no good results. “All right,” says the father, “that boy must be taught what fire really is. He must learn by an experience he will remember.” So when the boy is about to touch the hot stove, his father does not interfere. The boy burns his hand and screams with pain. The mother is in tears. The father is in tears. But the boy has learned his lesson. He now knows that fire will burn, and, therefore, he leaves the matches alone. Hard was hard, too, for the father; but the pain was worth the cure. So with God and his erring children. We have certain faults and weaknesses. Our friends have told us about them. Our enemies have told us about them. They have both held up the mirrors for us to see our faults. But we would not. God is sorry, but if we will learn in no other way, we must learn in that. Some tragedy comes in our life, and we say: “What a misfortune! How could our loving Father allow that to fall upon us?” My friend, it is not a misfortune. It is discipline. That fault in you had to be corrected to save you from worse evil. Be thankful that it was sent to you. And take care you learn the lesson it was sent to teach.

We are puzzled when this experience happens to us, though we are able to trace back the evil causes of our neighbors' tragedies. Indeed, it is far easier for a physician to diagnose the disease of another man than to prescribe for the malignant fever that is burning his own vitals. When we go through life and find one trouble coming to one man, and another trouble coming to another man, and still another trouble coming to a third, we say, “There, I told you so. Those men were once boys with me, and grew up with me, and I knew they would come to no good end. Why, years ago, those men were laying the foundations of these very failures. I knew it and told them so.”

Carry your thoughts back to the days of your old Christian home. Are you not startled at the changes in your life? Have you not degenerated? If, to-day, you could make a large sum of money by unloading a lot of worthless land as future building lots upon some ignorant purchaser who had not yet cut his wisdom teeth, would you do it? How are you different from your old friend whose misfortunes you were just discussing? The only difference between you and him is the rapidity with which you are losing your moral and spiritual integrity. Are you going to forget the weakness that overthrew your old schoolmate? As one who looks into a mirror and then turns away and forgets how he appears, will you ignore the lessons which your neighbor's misfortunes are preaching to you?

The Perfect Mirror

But if we can see our sins reflected in the moral and spiritual tragedies of those about us, can we not see what we might become by Christian grace, in the joy and the happiness of those who are living about us and who are living for the higher life? If the mightiest temperance lessons are preached by the intoxicated man, staggering and hiccuping along the public highway, so the greatest truths of Gospel peace are preached in the smiling, radiant and triumphant looks of those who for years have been walking with and living near Christ. And if you will go to some of those consecrated, happy Christians, they will tell you that once they were family. They were carrying these robes and gifts to the house of the bride.

Madame said that the bride would be dressed by the women of her family in the morning, and then would sit on a throne all day, awaiting the coming of the bridegroom in the evening. He would be escorted to her house by servants and male friends, all carrying lighted candles. The bride would rise to receive him with folded hands and downcast eyes. He would then throw back her veil and gaze upon her face for the first time; after which she would offer him a seat beside her.

"As for divorce," continued Madame, "in the East nothing is easier. The divorce court stands literally at the door of the mosque. A Turk has only to say to his wife, 'Go,' and she is divorced. There are three courts, or degrees, and if the husband says, 'I divorce you by the three degrees,' then no one can bring her back to him; but if he does not so divorce her, and wishes her back again, through a pacha or judge of the first or second degree she may be brought back to him. The only way to recover a wife who has been divorced by the three degrees is for her to be married to some one else, and divorce him; then she may return to the first husband."

A case was cited of a wife who had been divorced by the three degrees. She was very rich, and the husband wishing to have her again as his wife, it was agreed that she should be married for a day to a young man from a distant town (to avoid scandal). The newly-wedded couple were much pleased with each other and the wife said, "I do not wish to return to my first husband. Take this money," and she gave him a goodly sum. "When you go to present your case to the judge, slip the note in his hand." When the first husband came the judge said, "No; these people are satisfied with each other, I cannot interfere."

A woman may divorce her husband for several reasons, however, among them impure breath, deception as to social or financial standing, and failure to support. This last cause is considered very important, for Turkish women, except of the lower class, do not work. They have no means of self-support and must live under the roof and at the expense of male relatives, of however remote a degree.

An hour passed in interesting conversation and then I ventured to suggest that I should like to meet the husband of my friend. She left the room for a few moments and returning, asked me to accompany her into the adjoining room, where we found her husband awaiting us. The other lady had not been invited to come with us. It would not have been allowable for her to be in the same room with a man who was in no way related to her.

R—— Bey, a handsome Turk to whom the red fez gave an air of distinction, proved a most delightful conversationalist, but regretted that he could not speak English. He showed an interest in things American.

Tea, cake, "Turkish delight" (sweetmeats) and sugared almonds continued to be served, till, at the suggestion of R—— Bey, we strolled through the grounds, and finally seated ourselves in a pavilion from which we could see the purple lights gathering on Tura Hills, and the swaying tops of the date palms that grew by the banks of the Nile, less than a mile away.

Madame spoke of her children, and when I expressed a wish to see them, she clapped her hands to summon a servant to fetch them. They soon appeared, a graceful little girl of nine and two sturdy lads who were little more than babies, but who already wore the fez. After they had retired, Madame said, "When my sons are about ten years old, I shall place them in school in Constantinople, and I hope I may be able to live there then, to be near them. My daughter," and she sighed, "I shall educate at home. It is best that she should not learn too much."

To my explanation of dissent and surprise she replied: "Ah, yes, the higher education for your women, but for ours—well, you see, my daughter must live the secluded life of a Turkish woman. Do you think she would be content if she knew of better things?"

Madame then disclosed something of her own history and of her ambitions for Turkish women.

"I was about establishing a school to teach the women of my country to keep house, to take intelligent care of their children and their homes. Believe me," she continued, "they know absolutely nothing. In the government schools they learn to read and write, it is true, but the State is careful that they do not learn too much. I had a house that I would have given for the purpose of industrial education, and money to commence the work. But extraneous circumstances made it unsafe for us to remain in Turkey any longer. I have an island home, but it would not be safe to go there; so I stay here with my husband and children, two boys (for which I am thankful), and only one girl, (for which I am also thankful). I returned once to my country, disguised, and landing as a second cabin passenger. I hid myself by day, but for all that my presence was suspected, and once more I fled by night, alarmed at the messages that reached me. I shall not dare return again until conditions change. We have incurred the enmity of the Sultan."

As she concluded she clapped her hands lightly, and saying something to the servant who answered the call he disappeared and returned in a few minutes carrying a bunch of roses which he laid on a table before me.

The sun was near its setting by this time, and as I knew that in the East the night falls quickly, I announced that I must terminate this delightful visit. It was R—— Bey who gave the signal now, and when the white-turbaned Oriental appeared, he ordered the carriage.

There was something pathetic in the way Madame pressed my hand and asked, "Will you write to me sometimes—something of your world?" I knew she meant something of my broader world.

In my absorption in Madame's story, and in the interest of my visit, I had quite forgotten the other guest, supposing, indeed, that she had gone home; but as I drove from the grounds I saw her near the window of the room where we had left her several hours before. Her face brightened as I waved a good-by, and I felt a warm sympathy for the woman who had been held prisoner all the afternoon by the custom of her country. Cairo, Egypt.

A Kansas Town Revival-Swept

ONE hundred people decided for Christ in one night during a revival which has just come to a close at Smith Center, Kan. The meetings were under the direction of Evangelist W. E. Biederwolf and his associates. During three weeks, nearly a thousand converts were made, among the number being the sheriff of the county, the judge of the probate court, the county clerk, the mayor of the city, the city marshal, nearly every lawyer in the city, a congressman, three bankers, several doctors, many prominent business men, the whole football team, and every student in the high school except two. The personal work was under the supervision of Howard E. Taylor. A great chorus choir, directed by Homer Rodeheaver, was also a potent factor. During the last four nights, over three hundred people made decisions for Christ. At the farewell meeting 2,500 people were in attendance.

As the people saw many prominent citizens and popular young men marching down the aisles, a roar of applause arose from all parts of the tabernacle, which continued for half an hour, as one by one people stepped out to give themselves to Christ. Men and women wept for joy at the sight; fathers and mothers fell on their knees, as they saw their girls and boys at the altar. The city marshal came forward, and when his son saw it, he went down the aisle to stand by the side of his father. Ottawa, Kan.

A Revival at Saranac Lake

SARANAC LAKE, N. Y., has been the scene of a revival. A series of union evangelistic meetings was planned for the last part of November, the Baptist, Episcopal, Methodist and Presbyterian Churches co-operating. Preparation was made extending over weeks and even months previous to the beginning of the meetings, which were under the leadership of Dr. Elliott and Mr. Maftger, his singer. From the very start, a blessing seemed to rest upon the work. At the men's meeting in the town hall, on the last Sunday afternoon of the series, nearly a thousand men were present. From eighty to one hundred took a public stand for Christ. A meeting for women was also crowded. Probably the most interesting and striking of the meetings was the one held on the last afternoon, when practically every place of business in the city was closed and the Methodist church was filled. It is believed that the impression made by these services will be a lasting one.

just as you are now. But the redeeming power of the Lord Jesus Christ came into their lives, and entirely changed their hearts and their whole natures. What they once loved they now hate. And as they talk, they seem to hold up to us a reflecting mirror showing us our nobler and better selves, as they say, "Brother, you can be like that. Sister, you can be like that. Will you let Christ work in you his miracle as he has done in our natures?" Oh, my brother, in the lives of your Christian friends, have you never caught a momentary reflection of what your spiritual face, by the grace of God, might become? Are you going to shut your eyes to that divine revelation, as the man beholding his natural face in a mirror turns away and forgets how he looks?

I want to ask you still another question. Is it not a fact, as the tragedies of your own life have been swooping down upon you with terrific anguish, that you have been longing more and more for the rapturous look you have seen in the peaceful countenances of your friends who have been living near and ever nearer to Christ?

If this fact is true when we look into the happy faces of our dear ones, how much truer is it when we look into the divine face of Jesus himself? Even in the best of our friends' faces we can find some flaws, if we only study those faces long enough; but in the face of Christ there is no flaw. There is a transforming power in the contemplation of that reflection. That is the divine secret of the changed character. "We all with unveiled face, beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image from glory to glory." Into that mirror let us ever look, and as we behold the perfection of that divine character, so will our own characters be changed into the same image. "We shall become like him, for we shall see him as he is."

EQUIPPING THE MISSION BOAT

WHEN the good missionaries, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Jansen, now on their way back to the Philippines, reach their station at Cebu, they will find there awaiting them the welcome news that their appeal to the friends of foreign missions for a Gospel boat has not been in vain. Negotiations have been concluded for the purchase of a stout, serviceable boat forty-seven feet in length, operated by a gasoline motor and engine driving a powerful screw, which will take them safely and expeditiously on the long rounds of their "parish of a hundred islands" in the waters of the Sulu archipelago.

Money for the purchase of the boat has been contributed by friends in almost every State of the Union, principally in small amounts. A considerable portion was secured through the personal efforts of Mr. and Mrs. Jansen, while here on furlough. They spoke before churches and Sunday Schools, at lectures, etc. Some part was raised through the efforts of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. Then the missionaries, being compelled to return to their field of labor, appealed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers to complete the work so well begun. In response to our appeal for this worthy cause, many readers have sent contributions, but the total is still considerably short of what is needed to complete the purchase and equipment of the mission boat. It is hoped, however, that sufficient contributions will come in to enable us to have the boat in readiness for transportation to Cebu within the next few weeks.

The mission boat, which by Mr. and Mrs. Jansen's desire is to bear the name El Heraldo Cristiano, in grateful compliment to the readers of this journal who have made its purchase possible, will be a most important auxiliary to the missionary work in that distant field. Her two-cylinder engine will drive her along at eight or nine miles an hour in the Philippine straits and inlets, and will enable the workers to accomplish more in one day than heretofore they have been able to do in three or four days with the native canoes. The mission boat is stout and stanch, electrically lighted and cooled; has a roomy covered cabin which is divided into (1) engine room and kitchen; (2) dining room; (3) large double bed-room; (4) two-bunk bed-room, and (5) wheel-room for steering. All the rooms are lighted by windows, the shades being shaded by Venetian blinds. Above the deck are stanchions for a good-sized awning to keep off the intense heat of the direct sun-rays, and to keep the cabin roof cool. There are numerous pantries, wardrobes, etc.; a cook-stove, folding dining table, folding desk, settees, and such other modest equipments as are necessary to the comfort and well-being of those who are to pass a large part of their daily existence on the mission boat. On the upper deck is a stanch ten-foot rowboat in davits.

El Heraldo Cristiano, to be complete, however, should have considerable additional equipment, and this will be supplied should funds come in for the purpose. A photograph of the mission boat appears on this page. Writing of his spiritual work among the natives at Cebu,

Missionary Jansen gives this interesting description:

"Here is a crowd of Filipinos, who are watching their missionary friends and the native fellow workers, as the latter leave the shore to take the Gospel to other towns in the various islands. Among our native teachers and evangelists are many who have made sacrifices to obtain Bible instruction, in order that they might teach their own people. Some have come from long distances, involving days of journeying over the mountains to reach the missionaries and get Bible instruction. 'Teach us, that we may teach our own people,' is the plea frequently heard by the American missionaries. When taught, these men and women willingly go to other islands and, year after year, seek to make the Gospel known. Many of these people are being awakened to a new life of unselfishness and love toward their fellow men.

"One of our young native pastors, speaking to his people of the love of God, said, 'One night, while sitting by the bedside of my dying child, as I looked at in prison, and while there he received a Bible from his young nephew, previous to being transferred to Manila. There, in the Bilibid prison, this man, through reading the Bible, found his Saviour and determined to serve God when he was pardoned and released. He returned to Cebu. He came to the Protestant missionaries. After some twelve months of patient and studious training, he went to work among the mountain villagers and farmers. Soon converts, won through him, were requesting baptism. He had no income. He had worn his shoes to pieces, and his last suit of clothes was worn till it could not hold together much longer. Almost barefooted, and in his ragged clothing, this worker presented himself at our station in Cebu, having been summoned by the missionaries. He was unconscious of having done anything creditable. As soon as he was given some decent clothing, he started back to his work of spreading the Gospel among the mountain families whom he in former days had harassed and compelled to join his revolutionary band. He is now receiving a small salary as an evangelist. He writes us cheering reports of his work. At one town, in four months, nearly one hundred believers were baptized. After the baptism, there came a great persecution.

"At another town, while the workers were holding service, the police arrived armed, accompanied by a large crowd of men and boys. These all yelled together against us and the Gospel we were preaching, using evil words and expressions, so that the mayor, Senor Tranguilino Ayrabunte, came. He struck the presiding evangelist, Angel Kanon, several heavy blows, and then ordered that he and three others of the Christians should be taken to prison. There they were kept for a night and part of a day."

Notwithstanding the persecutions in that town, in one month there were one hundred people baptized and a church has been established. In another interior town over two hundred adults and fifty-eight children have been baptized, and there are many more who desire baptism.

This heroic worker is now entrusted with the spiritual care of four island towns and the surrounding districts. The believers in one of these (the town of D—) have commenced to build a church.

This is only one of several instances in which the missionaries have been unexpectedly reinforced by men raised up specially for the work in a most wonderful way. Their field is a large one and widely scattered throughout the group of islands, and they are eagerly looking forward to the arrival of the mission boat as the greatest aid to their labors. Our readers, who are interested in the winning of the Philippines for Christ, have now an opportunity to assist in this specially attractive Gospel campaign. We invite them to send in their contributions in order that the mission boat may be completed and forwarded to Cebu with the least possible delay.

All contributions in aid of the mission boat should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, which will acknowledge them in its columns.

The Mission Boat, "El Heraldo Cristiano," for Gospel Work in the Philippines

the helpless and suffering babe, a strange pity and yearning love toward the little one filled my heart. I longed to take the moaning child in my arms, and soothe away its restlessness and relieve its pain. I had seen others of my children die and had sat beside them as they suffered; but never had this yearning love filled my heart before. As my tears of a new love and pity fell beside that little child, the thought came to me, 'This is how the Lord feels toward the poor, sin-sick world. This is like the yearning love and compassion which brought Jesus down to us, and into the life of the most sin-stained and degraded of us, that he might take us in his tender arms.'

"One of our Filipino evangelists," continues Mr. Jansen, "was once a revolutionary leader. He was put

ARMENIA IN SORE STRAITS

LETTERS from American missionaries in Asia Minor confirm the information already conveyed in cable dispatches and previous letters regarding the widespread suffering in that country. Rev. W. W. Peet, of the American Bible House, Constantinople, in forwarding these letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, writes:

They show an unusual state of destitution throughout the greater part of Asia Minor. All point to a situation which I apprehend will represent a further degree of destitution in Asia Minor than has been known for many years.

From Erzerum Dr. Underwood writes that the British Consul from Bitlis reports that several hundred persons in the Moush plain and vicinity will probably starve to death if relief is not sent to them soon.

A Bitlis letter says:

Unless help comes soon it is likely to be too late. The price of wheat is extremely high, and the ability of the people extremely low and suffering and liability to starve look us now squarely in the face. We have never known such sad conditions before.

From Cesarea comes this gloomy forecast:

The prospect ahead of us is very bad. There was a great shortage of the wheat crop and the price has doubled from four to five piasters for a batman of seventeen pounds, up to nine to ten, and it cannot be had freely even at that rate. Many families are even now begging to be allowed to buy a single batman. One or two native friends have joined in securing five hundred batmans of flour to be sold at retail in case the price gets away up.

A missionary at Adana writes:

The harvest was a great failure. In many places they did not reap one-fifth of the seed sown, consequently not only is there great scarcity of wheat for seed and flour, it is also very dear. The price has gone up to nearly double the price of a few years ago, at least one and one-half of last year's price. There are many people who have no wheat and no money with which to buy. Some have property, which they would sell in order to buy wheat, but purchasers are difficult to find, sometimes impossible. This condition holds especially in the town of Shar. We visited Tashgee, Karakeuy, Dikme, Gurumzeh, Yerebakanz. In every place we found distress. Many people are beginning to crowd down into the plain in the hope of finding food or work. Whole families are coming. They have nothing to bring with them. Their sufferings this winter will be great indeed. The government has applied to the Sivas and other provinces to facilitate the transfer of grain into this district. That the distress begins thus early in the year indicates that the distress will be great before the winter is well begun.

THE MORNING PRAYER IN CONGRESS

A Hush Falls on the House, as Representatives and Spectators Reverently Rise, with Bowed Heads

THERE is hardly a section of this great country which has not been greatly interested in the recent discussion as to whether this is a Christian nation. Proof that it is so was overwhelming, and the photograph printed above ought to go a great way toward convincing the most sceptical. Every session of Congress in Washington is opened by the Chaplain with prayer. If it be the opening day of a new Congress the seats are all filled by the members some time before the fall of the Speaker's gavel calls for silence. Up to that moment there is a constant buzz of conversation, the older members renewing acquaintance with fellow representatives, the new arrivals watching keenly every movement of the leaders of the legislative body of which they will become part as soon as they have taken the oath. With the fall of the gavel and at a word from the Speaker, all are silent and heads bowed while the Chaplain offers a petition for divine guidance in the work of Congress. The prayers are short and to the point.

The moment the "amen" is uttered, the buzz of conversation again fills the air, as Congress is not noted as a quiet assembly, and the members show a strong desire to talk to one another if they cannot address the chair.

At the succeeding days of the session members are not so prompt at reaching their seats and the attendance at opening prayer is somewhat smaller, but the members have great reverence for the custom. The Continental Congresses always opened with prayer and it was also the custom in the legislatures of an earlier day. The "General Court," as the legislature was called in Massachusetts, opened its sessions with prayer, and the same custom was carried out in other colonies.

One of the most interesting documents of a historical nature that have come recently to light shows the high regard the members of our Revolutionary Congress had for religion and how strongly they were impressed with the necessity of providing the people with the Book of books. A printer of Philadelphia, named Robert Aitken, discovered that there was a great scarcity of Bibles and he petitioned Congress on January 21, 1781, to take up the subject. The matter was reported to a committee, which made a report in September of the next year. The report declared "that Mr. Aitken has at great expense now finished an edition of the Holy Scriptures in English; that the committee have from time to time followed the progress of the work." They recommended that Dr. White and Mr. Duffield, the two Chaplains of Congress, should examine it. The Chaplains reported that they were much pleased with it. Congress then passed a resolution approving Mr. Aitken's undertaking and recommending his edition of the Bible to the people of the United States.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE MOTTO

IN view of the very general discussion aroused by the removal of the motto, "In God We Trust," from the coinage, the following correspondence, now printed for the first time, will be read with interest:

MR. HENSHALL'S LETTER

"KANSAS CITY, Mo., November 1, 1907.

"Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, Washington, D. C.:

"DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: This is 'God's world,' and knowing this great fact, I think the inscription on our coins, 'In God We Trust,' is a simple recognition of the sovereignty of God over our great republic. No other nation in Christendom has seen fit to put itself on record, and why does this sentiment of gratitude appeal to the people of the United States? Because 'He kept the best wine until the last.' He has blessed us above any other nation, and in direct proportion to our benefits, so must our responsibilities be.

"When the Old World was in dire need by famine, the fiat came to us, 'Give ye them to eat.' And behold, vast quantities of flour and breadstuffs were shipped through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and other avenues to China and India and they were nourished into life.

"Ever thine, THOMAS HENSHALL."

THE PRESIDENT'S REPLY

"THE WHITE HOUSE, WASHINGTON, November 11, 1907.

"Mr. Thomas Henshall, Kansas City, Mo.:

"DEAR SIR: When the question of the new coinage came up we looked into the law and found there was no warrant therein for putting 'In God We Trust' on the coins. As the custom, although without legal warrant, had grown up, however, I might have felt at liberty to keep the inscription had I approved of its being on the coinage. But as I did not approve of it, I did not direct that it should again be put on. Of course the matter of the law is absolutely in the hands of Congress, and any direction of Congress in this matter will be immediately obeyed. At present, as I have said, there is no warrant in law for the inscription.

"My own feeling in the matter is due to my very firm conviction that to put such a motto on coins, or to use it in any kindred manner, not only does no good, but does positive harm, and is in effect irreverence, which comes dangerously close to sacrilege. A beautiful and solemn sentence, such as the one in question, should be treated and uttered only with that fine reverence which necessarily implies a certain exaltation of spirit. Any use which tends to cheapen it, and, above all, any use that tends to secure its being treated in a spirit of levity, is from every standpoint profoundly to be regretted. It is a motto which is indeed well to have inscribed on our great national monuments, in our temples of justice, in our legislative halls, and in buildings such as those at West Point and Annapolis—in short, wherever it will tend to arouse and inspire a lofty emotion in those who look upon it. But it seems to me eminently unwise to cheapen such a motto by use on coins, just as it would be to cheapen it by use on postage stamps, or in advertisements. As regards its use on the coinage, we have actual experience by which to go. In all my life I have never heard any human being speak reverently of this motto on the coins or show any signs of its having appealed to any emotions in him. But I have literally hundreds of times heard it used as an occasion of, and incitement to, the sneering ridicule which is above all things undesirable that so beautiful and exalted a phrase should excite. For example, thruout the long contest, extending over several decades, on the free coinage question, the existence of this motto on the coins was a constant source of jest and ridicule; and this was unavoidable. Everyone must remember the innumerable cartoons and articles based on phrases like, 'In God we trust for the short weight;' 'In God we trust for the thirty-seven cents we do not pay,' and so forth, and so forth. Surely I am well within bounds when I say that a use of the phrase which invites constant levity of this type is most undesirable.

"If Congress alters the law and directs me to replace on the coins the sentence in question, the direction will be immediately put into effect; but I very earnestly trust that the religious sentiment of the country, the spirit of reverence in the country, will prevent any such action being taken. Sincerely yours, [Signed] THEODORE ROOSEVELT."

The Problem of the Poor

WHEN the Bishop of London was in this country recently, he traveled around a good deal more than the usual visitor. Consequently he saw more, and being a man gifted with large powers of observation and a sympathetic nature, he has reached certain conclusions concerning America which are both interesting and suggestive. While here he went into all classes of society, hobnobbing with the rich and mingling with the poor; going down among the money-changers of Wall Street and venturing into the slums, and dropping a kind, genial word and a Gospel message everywhere.

In an article in the current issue of the Cosmopolitan, the good bishop has recorded his impressions of our hospitality, our church life, and our colleges, and he has also touched on the great problem which is at its acute stage here every year at midwinter—the problem of the poor. In this connection he makes several suggestions, one of which, at least, deserves the fullest consideration. "In America," he says, "your rich men and men of ability must learn more of the stewardship of ownership. . . . I reconcile my belief in God and his love for the wretched millions on the East Side of New York, in East London and other great cities—teeming millions of the unfortunate, seemingly abandoned by both God and men—with this: the rich minority have in trust for all others. Disregard of this is the cause of all social evils. If every man considered himself a steward, there would be no object in dishonesty."

Then comes the bishop's suggestion. The churches and the good people of both countries are equally engaged in the fight against wrong, against tyranny and against evil. "We fight to relieve the poor and to aid the oppressed on both sides of the Atlantic. Let us have a generous rivalry and see which can do the best. . . . I would propose an international competition between New York and London, in the matter of looking after the poor."

What mighty results in alleviating the distress of seemingly hopeless multitudes and in bringing sunshine and joy into the hearts of a great army of "God's poor," could be accomplished by such a movement! New York's misery, as seen in the East Side tenements and in the Bowery Mission Bread-Line, has its parallel in the homes of poverty and the night refuges of the British metropolis. We have had rivalry in war, in finance, in trade and industry, and in a great variety of other ways. Let us hope that the big-hearted bishop's suggestion may bear fruit and that a friendly international co-operative movement for the benefit of the deserving poor may yet be organized. It would be a rivalry in well-doing that should appeal to the great body of Christian men and women in both countries as the worthiest of all.

A Disease and a Remedy

FROM Dr. Thomas Darlington, president of the Board of Health of New York, comes a warning that applies in some degree to other parts of the country. He calls attention to the fact that there were one hundred and eighty-six deaths from heart disease in New York in one week recently, while the rate of increase in such deaths for the whole year is nearly one-third in excess of those of recent years. This, too, in spite of the fact that the average duration of human life in this generation has increased by three or four years. The inference from these statistics is obvious. Business worries and anxiety over financial losses, or apprehension of possible loss, are causing acute tension, and the heart will not stand the strain. Men break down under their burdens and lay down their lives before old age comes upon them.

We do not expect to find prescriptions in the ancient prophets, but it is remarkable that Isaiah gives one that exactly suits this modern complaint. He probably saw men in his day harassing themselves about the future, distressed by business losses and apprehensive about possible poverty as they are now.

Seeing clearly what were the essentials of happiness and realizing that the blessedness of life was altogether apart from the objects about which men were so deeply concerned, he gives us this direction for the quiet restfulness which is the antidote to worry: "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee." That is a message for all times, especially for these. It leaves on the surface the business anxieties which are inevitable in the business world, and points out a sure resting place where perfect peace is enjoyed.

The modern physician, with all his skill and learning, can find no remedy for this prevalent disease that can compare with the ancient prescription. The stress and strain of this strenuous life, which press on men till they fall in the street, or in their homes and offices, as if they had been shot, do not reach the man whose mind is stayed on God. A barrier is erected in his soul that they cannot overleap. Beneath him are the everlasting arms, and he has a haven of calm and peace from which the storm of apprehension and distress is excluded. He realizes that all his most precious possessions, the things that endure, are safe in God's keeping, and that nothing can come upon him without the consent of his heavenly Father, and in that consciousness he has a peace that the world cannot give, neither can it take away. In that God-given peace is a sure remedy for the worries and harass that are straining men's lives to the breaking point.

The Fleet on Its Way

OUR magnificent fleet has made an auspicious beginning of its long three and a half months' voyage. No untoward incident has marked its progress thus far, and when the battleships and their auxiliaries left Trinidad, where their officers and crews were grandly entertained as Christmas guests, the entire line was in perfect condition for the next "long run" of the cruise, which will bring them up in a South American port.

It is interesting, meanwhile, to note the various changes of attitude on the part of the "knockers" or pessimistic critics, who are still apprehensive of international complications as the result of the Pacific practice cruise. One journal insists that the fleet will remain permanently as the guardian of our Western coasts, and that a new Atlantic squadron will be an immediate necessity, the creation of which will put us in second place among the naval powers of the world. Another, with keen political vision, foresees the formation of a British Pacific fleet to offset our naval advantage in those waters. Still another—and this time it is a French editor who has never been in Japan, and who is now visiting the United States for the first time—declares our fleet inferior in every way to that of Japan, though numerically stronger, and warns us that if our battleships go as far as the Philippines, Japan will interpret its presence as a menace.

As prominence has been given to the views of these sensationalists in certain newspapers, we refer to them here only to point out the fact that their absurdity is made clear by Secretary Taft, who has just returned from Japan, bringing with him the assurances of the most cordial friendship and perfect understanding between the two governments. Japan, like ourselves, has home problems of her own, engrossing the attention of her statesmen. There is no more reason why we should doubt her honor and friendship now than at any time within the last fifty years.

Burden-Bearing

"BEAR ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ," is a familiar Scriptural injunction.

What is the law of Christ about burden-bearing? If we read the Sermon on the Mount, we find that Jesus commanded his disciples to exceed in conciliation and in generosity whatever might be asked of them, although the exactions might be unreasonable and churlish. It is worth while for us in candid moments to inquire of ourselves whether or not we are living day by day within the scope of the Sermon on the Mount. How far are we willing to go in bearing burdens for our neighbor? What sort of burdens are those that we may bear without doing our neighbor harm?

In a certain rural neighborhood, there was a man whose shiftless ways and idle life made him a reproach in a township where everybody worked and earned a comfortable livelihood. This man, whose name happened to be Job, but who had none of the patriarch's qualities, except, perhaps, patience, had a family. He and his family taxed the forbearance of everybody near them, for they contentedly accepted alms and made not the slightest effort to free themselves from dependence. Once in a while the man would do an honest day's work; usually he passed his time in loafing; in winter beside the stove, in summer out-of-doors in the sun. In plain terms, he was lazy, and his wife and children shared the same unfortunate temperament. However, they were not allowed to suffer. When the pretty little daughter stopped at a door with her basket, the good housewife filled it from her larder and the overflow of every wood-pile in town went to heat the idle man's kitchen. Here was an example of the folly of bearing one sort of burdens. When people are in health and have no excuse for indolence, they should be compelled by stern fate to be industrious. We are wrong when we foster in any one the weakness that allows him to be a satisfied beneficiary.

Nevertheless, we have to guard our hearts against hardness. Most of us would far rather give often to the unworthy, than turn a single worthy and despairing applicant from our threshold.

There are burdens of another sort, not to be weighed in earthly balances, nor touched, nor handled, although they crush those who sustain them with the heaviness of despair and the sharpness of torture. Everywhere on the road of life we meet those who have fallen among thieves and lost faith, courage and hope. They have parted with the religion that was taught them at the mother's knee, and no loss is so great, no life is so empty as the life that has lost the childlike confidence in God that makes the darkest night bright.

Let us try morning by morning to bear the burdens of our comrades, of the workers in our kitchens and our fields, of the teachers who instruct our children, and of the children who are learning that all the difficult lessons are not contained in the book. Thus shall we fulfil the law of Christ.

Jewish Immigrants in London

SCARCELY less popular than the United States as a refuge for the Jews of Russia is Great Britain. The Jews now resident in London are estimated at eighty thousand, which is nearly three times the number in Jerusalem. A very large number of these came from Russia. A significant fact was observed in a charitable school in London recently when the teacher asked all the children who had been born in Russia to hold up their hands. Large numbers responded; but when the teacher called upon all children whose parents had been born in Russia to hold up their hands, nearly every child in the school responded. The school itself is doing an excellent work among the Hebrew immigrants. It is in the eastern district, known as Spitalfields, and is devoted entirely to Jews. It was founded in 1770 for educating, clothing, and apprenticing twenty-one poor boys, but so sagaciously was its fund invested, and so hugely has the value of land appreciated during the interval, that it now has 3,400 children on its roll. Of these, four hundred receive a free breakfast every morning. It is noteworthy that the little Russian Jewish children show marked skill in acquiring the language. Instances are given in which children who could speak nothing but Russian when they landed, have been able before the end of a year to speak English fluently, and that, too, without a trace of the Cockney accent. The boys and girls adapt themselves so readily to the society around them that the accession to the population is but little noticed. The wealthy members of the race take a deep interest in the welfare of the new-comers, and find them congenial occupations as they graduate from the schools. It is worthy of note that New York contains the largest Jewish population of any city in the world. The Jewish Year Book, recently issued, gives it as 700,000. The next is Vienna with 130,000, and the third is Berlin with 95,000. Jerusalem has less than 30,000. Scattered through Russia are over five millions in spite of the large emigration. The total number in the world is estimated at a little over eleven millions. Both in numbers and in intelligence, as well as in wealth, they will form a strong State when the day comes for their restoration, as it surely will, the promise being as certain as the threat which has been so accurately fulfilled:

I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth. . . . And I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up. (Amos 9 : 9, 15.)

An Ancient Marriage Contract

An interesting document, one of several taken from a tomb near Cairo, and presented to the Museum of Art of Toledo, O., has proved to be of rare value. It has been deciphered by Dr. Spiegelburg, of the University of Strasburg, Germany, who has just published a translation of its contents. It is a marriage contract, regularly dated and signed by a priest, who acted as registrar. It shows that the marriage customs of ancient Egypt reversed in some particulars those existing among us. One of these is that the prospective husband furnished the dowry, and the wife became the guardian of the purse and the holder of the common property. She had also the right to obtain a divorce, if she so desired, and in that case she returned to the husband one-half the dower he had brought, and one-third of the property acquired by their joint efforts. Incidentally, the document fixes the date long sought of the reign of Pharaoh Khabbasha, which has been a point of dispute among Egyptologists. It is dated in a year corresponding with 341 B.C., when that Pharaoh is stated to have been on the throne. It also confirms the statement of Diodorus, the Greek historian, as to the predominance of women in ancient Egypt, which, until this papyrus was deciphered, lacked corroboration. Thus information of great historical value comes to us on a papyrus over two thousand years old, and becomes available through the learning of modern scholars. Who can tell whether among the ancient documents now waiting to be deciphered there may not be some writing preserved in the providence of God which at the right moment shall come to light to confute his enemies?

Truth shall spring out of the earth. (Psalm 85: 11.)

An Alleged Miracle

There is great excitement in a village near Nancy in France over a miracle said to have been worked in the Roman Catholic Church there. The congregation present at the mass at a recent celebration declare that they saw a vision of Christ on the altar. It quickly vanished, but that it was seen for some moments is solemnly asserted by many witnesses. The priests and several experts who have investigated the story, give a rational explanation, but it is scouted as irreverent by believers. It appears that over the altar is a large figure which, when the candles are placed in a certain position, is dragged him out. Efforts were then made to save the third man, but it was found that his exertions in holding his brother had caused his foot, which rested on the ledge, to slip into a cleft in the rock. The rescuers threw ropes to him, which he held, but he could not detach his foot. He was already exhausted by his long immersion in the icy water, and while plans were being made to save him he was seen to fall forward, apparently in a fainting condition. That he was beyond hope was evident to every watcher, and they sorrowfully reported his death. The one member of his body being held, worked as fatal a result to the poor fellow as if his whole body had been involved. It is often so in spiritual catastrophes. People speak lightly of some sin that they regard as trivial and take credit for their otherwise general good conduct, which may really be irreproachable with that exception. Yet the teaching of the Bible is explicit on the subject:

Whoever shall keep the whole law and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all. (James 2: 10.)

Zoroaster's Eternal Fire

A remarkable discovery has been made in the neighborhood of Baku, in the Caucasus. It is that of an oil well which is now yielding ten thousand barrels a day. The curious fact about it is, that the mouth of the well is within the bounds of an ancient temple dedicated to the worship of fire. The famous Zoroaster is said to have maintained there a fire which was never extinguished. It is easy to understand how in those ancient days such a flame must have appeared to be miraculous. It is doubtful, however, whether Zoroaster worshipped fire. It was only after his death and the degradation of his religion that fire-worship became a recognized practice. It arose from the idea that, Mazdao being the origin of light, the flame on his altars must forever be fed, so that the light, which was believed to have descended from heaven, should not go out. It formed the connection between heaven and earth, and must be kept burning from one generation to another. It is not surprising, therefore, that the flame from an oil-well was venerated and a temple built around it. It is only in the light of revelation that natural phenomena are understood for what they are and are saved from becoming idols.

The invisible things from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made. (Rom. 1 : 20.)

A Dangerous Gift

An extraordinary evidence of the vitality of germs is furnished by an incident reported from Springfield, O. In clearing up her house some days ago, a mother found among the relics of her girlhood some dolls, which she brought down for her two little daughters. They were old-fashioned, but the children had never had such dolls before and they were delighted with them. It did not occur to the mother that those dolls had been taken from her and stored away after she had suffered from scarlet fever. That was twenty years ago, and if she had recollected the fact she would have thought that the dolls could not have held the infection all that time. She discovered her mistake, however, in a few days, for both her children were prostrated by the disease, though they had not been exposed to infection from any other source. The persistence of evil similarly surprises people at times. Words hastily uttered and forgotten by those who speak them may live in the memory of some who hear them, and bear deadly fruit after many years.

Suffer not thy mouth to cause thy flesh to sin; neither say thou before the angel that it was an error. (Eccles. 5 : 6.)

reflected on the glass of the monstrance, the case in which the host is enclosed, and, as experiment shows, produces an image that superstitious persons might mistake for the face of a living being. This is the real cause of the appearance that the worshippers regarded as miraculous. There are, of course, many who are not satisfied with this explanation, but they should not resent it. The face they thought they saw could not have helped them, as that reflection can of which the apostle writes:

We all beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord are changed into the same image. (II. Cor. 3: 18.)

Held in a Cleft

A distressing fatality is reported from Providence, R. I. Three young men started out in a canoe from the Pawtuxet Canoe Club on a recent holiday. They appear to have miscalculated the force of the current, which had enormously increased above the normal. The canoe was seized in a situation which is generally regarded as safe and was carried over the river falls and capsized. One of the young men caught a life buoy and was drawn safely to shore. One of the others climbed on a rock which had a ledge affording a rest for his foot. He caught his second companion, who was his brother, and, holding him tightly by the shoulders, raised him out of the water, until the men on shore, with a buoy and ropes,

By MARY McCRAE CULTER

CHAPTER VIII

A NEW ENVIRONMENT

MR. ALLAN spent the morning at the Lawrence farm in the field with the men, watching the great heading-machine which cut a twelve-foot swath at every round; riding in the header-boxes which were carefully driven beside the header to catch the golden shower of wheat-heads which fell from the elevator; watching the stackers build their stacks with such perfect skill that they would not take a drop of rain; making friends of the men by his genial ways, and absorbing the glorious sunshine and stimulating air of the perfect day. Long before noon every trace of his depression had vanished, and he felt like a new man before whom all the world lay glorious and inviting, and who was capable of accomplishing almost anything.

It was not until dinner was over and the work carefully finished up, that he had any opportunity for making the acquaintance of the elder daughter of the house. In her dainty afternoon dress, and amid her tasteful surroundings, she looked worthy to be a society leader, and it was hard to imagine that she had just assisted in cooking a meal for a lot of hungry harvest hands. Her manner was quiet, dignified and self-possessed, yet friendly and cordial as that of her parents. When she spoke, she looked at him with clear, steady eyes which were free from the self-conscious "fetching" glances that accompanied Hollis Hayward's conversation. It gave to her the charm of frank sincerity, which was accentuated by the steady tones of her perfectly modulated voice. One could not look into Kathleen Lawrence's eyes and listen to her voice, and at the same time even imagine her stooping to anything dishonorable.

Some such thoughts as this floated through the minister's mind as he sat and talked with this new acquaintance that afternoon. The discovery of mutual friendships in the East, made when Kathleen was a student at Wellesley College, quickly put the two upon an almost intimate basis, and furnished material for an eagerly animated conversation. Questions, descriptions, reminiscences of persons and places, came thick and fast, and before they realized it, the afternoon was gone, and Kathleen had to hasten to her duties in kitchen and dining-room.

After supper, there was music upon piano, violin and guitar, in which the girls were assisted by two of the farm hands, who proved to be fairly good musicians. As Mr. Allan sat in the cool bow window, listening and looking at his cheerful and tasteful surroundings, he found it hard to believe that he was in a Kansas farmhouse, and that the refined young ladies who were furnishing such congenial entertainment were country girls.

He was receiving the enlightenment which is so surprising to the majority of Easterners when they first come in contact with the natives of the "wild West," and enjoy the lavish hospitality of "Starving Kansas."

When Kathleen got out her book of college songs and began to sing some of the old favorites with which the students of Yale and Princeton had been wont to make the welkin ring, the Rev. Edgar Allan forgot that he was the pastor of a Western church, and laying aside his dignified reserve, he was joining in the songs, the merry repartee, the laughter, with which the remainder of the evening was filled; and not once did his thoughts revert to Hollis and the neglected German book.

Mr. Lawrence, looking on, nodded his head wisely and said to his wife: "Now he will get on with the young people. He has held himself too much away from them, and listened to too many stories against them, perhaps. Now that he is learning to know them as they are, he will be able to help them, and when a feeling which came to every one, whether minister or hired man, who entered that house.

He was not elaborately "entertained." The freedom of the place was his, to go and come, to read from the daily newspaper, the latest magazines or the well-chosen library, to write or study, to walk or drive. He helped the girls to pick berries, went on errands and made himself generally useful, and was soon on intimate terms with everybody.

Of course church interests were not forgotten, and many were the serious talks over existing conditions and future aims. In these, Mr. Allan felt his only constraint. He remembered the words

Hayward has wound him round her finger. You can see her influence in every opinion he expresses on church affairs. She has made him believe that the rest of us are a society of schemers, and that he must beware of us. It's a wonder that she allowed him to come over here at all. Oh, the wolf in sheep's clothing!" she cried hotly to Kathleen in the privacy of their own room.

Kathleen smiled. "Whom do you intend to designate as 'the wolf'? Is that your pet name for Mr. Allan, or for Hollis?"

"My rhetoric was rather uncertain—that's a fact," acknowledged Mabel; "but one cannot use clear language to express muddled situations, now, can she? You are away from Hawthorne so much that you do not have to bear what comes to the rest of us, and so can see something amusing in these petty trials of ours; but we have to stay here and 'grin and bear them', until at times our 'grinning' becomes more ghastly than merry."

Kathleen was about to bid her sister be charitable, but Mabel continued:

"You were greatly incensed by Hollis' attempt to confuse and disgrace the choir the first Sunday evening after you got home, and if you remember, you said some—well—ungentle things about her. If you had to stand such things fifty-two Sundays in the year, with times between thrown in, your patience would become as threadbare as ours."

"She has made Mr. Allan innocently do dozens of things as bad as that, so that half the people are offended at him, and the other half are suspicious of every move he makes. He often preaches a splendid sermon, and then, even before he leaves the church, erases every bit of its good effect by some unwise word or act which is born of her influence. I wish the man in the moon would fall in love with her and carry her away." The girl had to stop and laugh at her own vehement words, and Kathleen said:

"Maybe she would induce the man in the moon to turn his back upon us; so that plan might prove disastrous. Why don't you wish that somebody or something might reform her? That would be better all around, in the long run."

"Yes, but I'm not wanting the 'long run.' It's the 'short cut' to peace and harmony that I am wishing for. Oh that I had Aladdin's lamp."

"And I am glad that you do not possess it," said Kathleen. "You are too impulsive, my dear sister."

"Perhaps. Maybe I will reform some day—I'll not promise, though. If we could only keep Mr. Allan here, and never let him go back to Mr. Hayward's—"

"Wait! wait!" interrupted Kathleen. "Are you sure that would be the very best thing? Would it solve the difficulty? Are you sure—positively sure—that all of our influence is exactly right, that we would never turn him against people, or cause him to make mistakes? Would we never interfere with his plans, nor discourage him in his work?"

"Now it is my time to cry 'stop,'" said Mabel mischievously. "I was not thinking or speaking of myself. I was only considering your influence as contrasted with that of Hollis."

"Then it is time to put out the light

he preaches he will shoot his arrows into their hearts instead of over their heads. It takes Kathleen to rub out bad impressions, and smooth out wrinkles. I never saw her equal."

"Yes, she is a dear girl," Mrs. Lawrence replied, and in the simple words and the quiet expression there lay the deep love of a mother's heart.

Mr. Allan did not go home the next day, nor even the next. He found his new surroundings so delightful; he was made so welcome, and so many reasons were urged for his stay, that he gave himself up to the pleasant experience, and felt himself once more "at home"— which Hollis had spoken, and was on his guard lest some crafty "scheme" be worked upon him, and he be induced to commit himself to some course of action which would make trouble in the church. Even the seeming candor and unselfish words of these friends did not convince him of their sincerity. He had looked through Hollis' eyes too long, and had been too strongly influenced by her words and personality. The change in his demeanor, whenever church topics were brought up, was quite apparent to his entertainers, and hot-spirited Mabel resented it.

and send you to bed, you naughty child. Whenever you begin to talk such foolishness, your conversation is no longer profitable."

Before he went back to Mr. Hayward's home, Mr. Allan had a long talk with Kathleen concerning the church music. "I have been trying to get Miss Hayward to promise to join the choir, as she has such a fine musical education, and is so capable of helping our singers. Do you consider our present organist competent for the place?" he asked.

"You cannot find a more conscientious, painstaking girl than Amy Conover," Kathleen replied, carefully ignoring his first sentence. "She is faithfully doing her best to help the church, and I should be very sorry to see her discouraged by being superseded by any one. If you will give her a list of the tunes you wish to have sung, in time for her to practise them, I think you will find that she will get along very nicely."

"I had thought that perhaps I could persuade you to take the organ, and Miss Hayward to lead the singing. Would not that be a good plan?"

Even Kathleen could hardly conceal her dislike for this scheme, and she was exceedingly thankful that her sister was not present, for Mabel would surely have expressed her opinion of Hollis Hayward's musical ability in no flattering terms. After a moment's hesitation, she replied:

"The choir is a very difficult thing to handle, and any change is apt to breed trouble. So long as they are harmonious, would it not be the wiser plan to make no radical change, but rather to encourage them to efforts for self-improvement? You know it does not do to depend upon a few, for workers are liable to leave at any time, and then what would you do? Would it not be better to encourage the present choir to self-improvement and facilitate it by affording them opportunity to practise?"

"That is true," he replied thoughtfully. "You are wiser than I. Perhaps it would make trouble if we were to change."

"I am quite sure that it would; and I sincerely rejoice in your decision," she replied quietly.

CHAPTER IX

DISILLUSIONMENT

HOLLIS HAYWARD was in a bad humor. She scowled at the note she held in her hand and tapped her foot impatiently as she read its contents for at least the twentieth time. It was an invitation from Amy Conover to attend a strawberry supper at her home, and had been received on the afternoon of the day upon which Mr. Allan had gone over to visit the Lawrences. This was Wednesday afternoon; the party was to take place that evening, and, so far, no one had come to offer her his escort to the Conover home, which was two miles from town. She had quarreled with Charlie Lester the week previous, and he had revenged himself by appearing at church with Mabel Lawrence on Sunday evening. She was very certain that she could not count upon his company, and when the note first reached her she was glad of it. She had triumphantly counted upon Mr. Allan's presence and his very desirable escort, and calculated that the invitation came quite auspiciously after his regretful leave-taking. It would surely prove the opportune opening for more decided and public attentions. She had dreamed contentedly over it on Monday and Tuesday, sure that Tuesday evening, at the latest, would find him in town. But when Wednesday morning merged into Wednesday afternoon and still the young minister was absent, dismay seized upon her.

"Kathleen Lawrence is keeping him there to spite me, and to secure his company for herself. Mean thing! I'd be ashamed to throw myself upon any one that way; but she stops at nothing when she has an ax to grind. Charlie Lester will take Mabel to-night, and Mr. Allan will go with Kathleen, and I will have to stay at home while they glory over my defeat. I won't! I simply won't! Yonder comes Glenn Fraser. Hattie Symonds is sick, so he will have no partner. I'll make him take me."

She sprang from her chair upon the porch and ran down to the gate in time to meet the young man who was sauntering up the street.

"Are you going over to Conover's to-night?" she asked, after the first greetings.

"Yes," Glenn replied.

"Are you going to take Hattie?"

"No. She is sick," he answered unsuspectingly.

"Then won't you take me? I want to go—awfully—but I have no escort unless you take pity on me."

"Where's Charlie?" Glenn asked, well knowing what the answer would be.

"Charlie! Don't mention him. He has deserted."

"And Mr. Allan? Why don't you press him into service? He's only a young fellow, even though he is a preacher, and I believe a party or two and a generally hilarious time with us young folks would take the starch out of him, and make him more what he ought to be. You haven't done your duty by him, Hollis. You've no business keeping him penned up here, poring over his books and making love to you, when he ought to be getting acquainted with other nice young people"—with a mischievous emphasis on the "nice."

Hollis pouted. "Now, Glenn, don't be horrid. If Mr. Allan chooses my company, what business is it to any one else? But that is neither here nor there. Will you take me to the party?"

"Where are your horse and buggy and the preacher? I shouldn't think you'd care for my humble, second-hand services, when you have such a combination as that at first hand."

"But I haven't—thanks to Kathleen Lawrence. They took Mr. Allan over to their place Monday morning, and they are still keeping him there. Kathleen Lawrence never stops for proprieties when she wants a beau."

"No more do you. Witness the present instance," retorted Glenn tormentingly.

"You horrid—" Hollis began, but Glenn interrupted.

"Hold on! Save your pet names for the preacher. First thing you know, you'll make me angry, and then—good-by party. Now, I'll make a bargain with you. I'll take you to Miss Conover's to-night if you'll promise to be good, and not pull Kathleen's hair, nor flirt with Charlie, nor keep Mr. Allan prisoner in a corner all the evening. Is it a bargain?"

Hollis was furious, and Glenn saw it and rejoiced in it. He did not want her company, but he was too good-natured to refuse to take her when there was no real reason why he should not do so. Moreover, he saw a chance to torment her, and to have some fun at her expense; hence the conditional offer. If there had been any possible chance for other company, Hollis would have left him without another word. As it was, she choked down her anger and answered:

"Well, I'll promise; but I want you distinctly to understand that you are perfectly horrid—and you're third choice, any way."

"That's all right! That's all right! We're even on both scores, so don't worry. I'll call for you at eight o'clock, and we'll quarrel all the way over there. Good-by."

Hollis looked after him as he went whistling down the street.

"Of all horrid boys, he is the horriest. I've a big notion not to go."

But all the same she went, and Glenn teased her to his heart's content before they reached their destination.

That is the heat of our ovens. That's why our beans are mealy, yet nutty; and why they digest. Beans—above all foods—need to be factory cooked.

You who bake beans at home, you don't know how good beans can be.

It isn't your fault, but you lack the facilities. You need more heat.

The fibre of beans must be broken down, else they are not digestible. And that requires a fierce heat.

We get it by using live steam in our ovens. Thus we apply a terrific heat without scorching.

The result is, our beans are digestible—yours are heavy. Ours are all cooked alike—yours are not. Ours are mealy, yet nutty, for the skins are not broken.

We bake the beans, the tomato sauce and the pork all together. That gives our delicious blend.

You will eat more beans, and will like them better, when you once know Van Camp's. And they are so convenient—always ready. A delicious meal without work or delay.

VanCamp's
BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE
PORK AND BEANS

We pay $2.10 per bushel for beans—use only full-ripe tomatoes—none but corn-fed pork.

We could buy beans for one-seventh what we pay. And buy catsup, ready made, for one-fifth what it costs us to make it.

But we use only the whitest, the plumpest the finest beans grown. And every tomato is ripened on the vines.

We have spent 47 years in learning how to perfect this dish.

That is why Van Camp's are so different from others. And why they command the largest sale in the world.

Once try them—once learn their flavor, their superlative zest—and no others will satisfy.

You may find that some beans cost a little less—and no wonder. We could easily cut our cost more than half, if we wanted.

But are not the best beans cheap enough, when you consider that beans are 84% nutriment? And isn't it better to get the beans that your people will like? You serve beans once a week now, perhaps.

You'll serve Van Camp's several times.

Prices: 10c, 15c and 20c per can. You can get them without the tomato sauce, if you prefer. At your grocers.

Let Him that Heareth Say, Come

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

THE day that Jesus Christ began to teach men was the Sabbath, and he was somewhere on the banks of the Jordan, not far from Bethabara. He had an audience of two men. He and they were together in a little booth or tent made of leaves, distant a short space from the roadway. There were many such little booths at that time, made by those who had come out of the cities to hear the wonderful preaching of John the Baptist, and desired to stay several days. The two men who heard the first teaching of Jesus were John and Andrew. They were friends and followers of John the Baptist, and were standing beside him very early that Sabbath morning, as Jesus passed on his way. John pointed Jesus out to them, saying: "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world!"

Then they left John and followed so closely after Jesus that he heard them and spoke to them, asking: "What seek ye?" They answered: "Teacher, where dwellest thou?" And Jesus answered: "Come and see." And then they walked beside him, and when they came to the place, they went in with him. It was then only about ten o'clock in the morning. Jesus bade them be seated, and he sat down and began his marvelous work of teaching men. It was all so wonderful, so wise, so sweet, they wanted others to hear, and they begged Jesus to stop a little while until each of them should go and find his own brother. Soon there were four in the group of listeners: John and James, Andrew and Peter. The teaching went on until night came on; indeed, they may have spent the night in the booth with Jesus, for the next day, early, when Jesus proposed going into Galilee, they were ready to accompany him.

On the way, they met a man named Philip, who lived in the same town as Andrew and Peter. At a glance Jesus saw the good that was in Philip's heart, and said to him: "Follow me." It was an invitation to join their company, which Philip readily accepted. Then it was Philip's turn to find another to listen to the teachings of Jesus. Under a fig-tree by the roadside, Philip saw his friend Nathanael. He seemed to be engaged in reading something. It was his book of daily prayer. Philip ran ahead of the others, and cried out: "We have found Him of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write: Jesus of Nazareth." And when a doubtful look came over Nathanael's face and words of doubt were on his lips, Philip said: "Come and see." And willing to be convinced, Nathanael rose and left the fig-tree to go with Philip, that he might see Jesus at close range. Jesus saw him coming, and with his divine power of heart-searching, even before Nathanael had reached his side, Jesus said to his first four followers: "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile." What a testimony for Jesus to give concerning a man!

Quiet Conversions

Nathanael seems to have heard what Jesus said, for he asked the question when he came close to Jesus, "Whence knowest thou me?" And Jesus replied: "Before Philip called thee, when thou wast under the fig-tree, I saw thee." What could Nathanael do but answer, "Thou art the Son of God; thou art the King of Israel." All his doubts were gone, and Jesus had a sixth follower. And they resumed their walk toward Cana. How their thoughts must have burned within them, while he opened to them the Scripture concerning himself!

"John saith, Behold the Lamb of God! And they followed Jesus." Thus began the Christian life of the first two disciples, died for you, and unite with the church," all that is needed is a quiet act of the will, a firm resolve to accept Jesus as your Saviour and follow his example in word and deed and thought, in sacraments and service. The little boy who said, "I've been trying to walk in the footsteps of Jesus," understood the essence of religion.

John, the beloved disciple, whose start in Christian life was following Jesus, in old age expressed Christian living in the same figure when, pointing to Christ, he bade us "walk even as he walked." "Even as he" was the favorite phrase of John in his old age when he wrote his first epistle, which means of course the same as "follow me" in this lesson.

Accurate Steering

A gentleman crossing the English Channel stood near the helmsman. It was a calm and pleasant evening, and no one dreamed of a possible danger to their good ship, but a sudden flapping of a sail, as if the wind had shifted, caught the ear of the officer on watch, and he sprang at once to the wheel, examining closely the compass. "You are a half point off the course!" he said sharply to the man at the wheel. The deviation was corrected, and the officer returned to his post. "You must steer very accurately," said the looker-on, "when only half a point is so much thought of." "Ah! half a point in many places might bring us directly on the rocks," he said. Christ's life is our chart. We must follow it closely in word and deed and thought.

"What seek ye?" It is good to be questioned and to question ourselves as to our motives. Even a Christian may be "seeking religion" as a charm or a mere affiliation with people of certain social position or religious views. We shall fail unless we "seek" the person of Christ. "Lovest thou me?" is the searching word of Jesus. Faith is friendship. Religion is a fellowship.

"Seek ye first the kingdom of God," said Jesus. Many who do care a little for Christ, by their acts revise the text and really make it read, "Seek fourth the kingdom of God—after business, and politics, and pleasure. We may have mixed motives, but to obey God and serve mankind must be the dominant motive or we are none of his."

"They abode with him." Christian life is not alone walking with Jesus, it is also resting in the security of his loving and powerful presence.

A group of rough boys were demanding some evil deed of a smaller boy. "I can't do it," he said. "What's the reason you can't? You will have to, I tell you. We are going to make you do it whether you want to or not. We are all of us against you alone, and how are you going to help yourself?" The boy who was beset with such overwhelming odds as this was silent for a moment, and then he said: "I can't do it; it's wrong, it's mean, and I can't do a mean thing. I am not as much alone as

"Looking upon Jesus as he walketh he saith, Behold the Lamb of God!"

Andrew and John, as quietly as the choice of Christ is made by a great majority of disciples in every age. Only one apostle, "born out of due time," was converted in a revolutionary way, but many have been troubled because their conversion was not a struggle, like Paul's, through darkness to light, forgetting that Paul, when he was Saul, had been taught wrong all his boyhood in the schools of the Pharisees. No wonder there was a struggle when at the gate of Damascus he saw the Nazarene he had been taught to hate as altogether false, as the One altogether lovely, the Prince of heaven! But Andrew and John had been in the Bible class of John the Baptist and learned about Jesus in advance, and so when he appeared needed only a word to turn to him as their new Master. So those who have been taught in Christian homes and Sunday Schools have no right to expect Christ will come to them as to Paul. Rather when parent or teacher says, "Behold the Lamb of God; confess your trust in the Saviour, who

FOUND A WAY

To Be Clear of the Coffee Troubles

"Husband and myself both had the coffee habit and finally his stomach and kidneys got in such a bad condition that he was compelled to give up a good position that he had held for years. He was too sick to work. His skin was yellow, and I hardly think there was an organ in his body that was not affected."

"I told him I felt sure his sickness was due to coffee and after some discussion he decided to give it up."

"It was a struggle, because of the powerful habit. One day we heard about Postum and concluded to try it and then it was easy to leave off coffee."

"His fearful headaches grew less frequent, his complexion began to clear, kidneys grew better until at last he was a new man altogether, as a result of leaving off coffee and taking up Postum. Then I began to drink it, too."

"Although I was never as bad off as my husband, I was always very nervous and never at any time very strong, only weighing 95 pounds before I began to use Postum. Now I weigh 115 pounds and can do as much work as anyone my size, I think."

"Many do not use Postum because they have not taken the trouble to make it right. I have successfully fooled a great many persons who have drunk it at my table. They would remark, 'You must buy a high grade of coffee.' One young man who clerked in a grocery store was very enthusiastic about my 'coffee.' When I told him what it was, he said, 'Why, I've sold Postum for four years, but I had no idea it was like this. Think I'll drink Postum hereafter.'" you think I am, either. There are two of us, and the other one is God, and he has always been more than a match for all that have come against him." The leader of the rough boys started back in amazement. He had not expected such an answer as this. He looked for a moment into the determined face of the little fellow before him, and then, casting a sheepish glance at his companions around him, he said: "Come on, fellows; let him alone. There is no use fooling with such a chap as that." And away they went, leaving the younger boy triumphant.

"He findeth first his own brother." Not alone our kin by blood but all our kind, kindred for whom Christ died, we should bring to him. A poor man begged for alms. The answer was, "I have nothing with me, brother, or I would aid thee." "It is enough," said the beggar, "since you have called me 'brother.'" It has brought Christ himself as near as a brother to the workingman that Jesus himself toiled at a trade.

"Isn't this Joseph's Son? Ay, it is he. 'Joseph the carpenter'—same trade as me! I thought as I'd find it, I knew it was here, but my sight's getting queer."

"I don't know right where as his shed might ha' stood."

But often, as I've been a-planing my wood, I've took off my hat just with thinking of he At the same work as me.

"He warn't that set up that he couldn't stoop down And work in the country for folks in the town. And I'll warrant he felt a bit pride like I've done At a good job begun."

"Thou shalt be called a rock" (petra). As Wellington came to be "the Iron Duke" and General Jackson, of the Confederate Army, for his firmness at Bull Run came to be "Stonewall Jackson," so Peter was to be "the Rock." But at first he was only a rolling stone. Not until he had been taught by Christ for three years and then had been filled with the Spirit would he become Like some tall cliff that rears its awful form Above the vale and midway leaves the storm; Though round its breast the raging clouds are spread, Eternal sunshine gathers on its head.

"Follow Me." Here it is again, the creed of two words. The Christian life is the Christlike life—a simple life of daily faithfulness.

I asked the Lord to let me do
Some mighty work for him;
To fight amidst his battle hosts,
Then sing the victor's hymn;
I longed my ardent love to show,
But Jesus would not have it so.

Then quietly the answer came:
"My child, I hear thy cry;
Think not that mighty deeds alone
Will bring the victory;
The battle has been planned by me;
Let daily life thy conquests see."

Not alone those prepared by a moral life, but the wickedest, are also called by the "Follow Me" of Christ. In a meeting of the Evangelistic Committee of Philadelphia, Mr. Asher told of his services held at Moyamensing prison and the House of Correction. At the latter place about forty prisoners held up their hands for prayer. As they are not permitted to sit out in the corridors, but must listen through the iron bars of their cell door, when the speaker urged all those within sound of his voice to accept Christ and turn from their sins, he saw one graceful, delicately fashioned hand of a woman extended imploringly from her cell. On the other hand, God also calls to his service the young man of strongest body, of clearest mind, for God wants our best as of old.

"Whence knowest thou me?" Christ read Nathanael's heart and found it honey without wax. He reads our hearts. Does he find them as pure and clean? His heart-searching of us and our prayers to him are a wireless telegraphy of daily intercourse. On October 17, 1907, William Marconi began a regular transatlantic wireless service across the Atlantic Ocean. Over five thousand words were transmitted from Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, to Clifden, Ireland, on the opening day. The instruments worked smoothly, accurately, and with great speed, and it can now be stated authoritatively that wireless telegraphy, for business purposes, is an assured success. But far more important is the wireless communication Jesus opened between the human soul and God.

NEVER MIND

If the fairest bloom that blows
Withers soon,
And the morning-glories close
Ere the noon,
Never mind it, never mind;
He that fashioned them is kind,
Just believe He thus designed
You a boon.

This life's burdens should be borne
With a song;
To complain of every thorn
Must be wrong.
Shadows always pass away;
Night is followed by the day,
And no evil thing can stay
Very long.

Till the night, in azure skies
No star shined.
Till some tears have washed our eyes
We are blind.
If, therefore, you seem to miss
What appears earth's highest bliss
Wisdom still would counsel this:
Never mind.

THE NEWLY INVENTED FOG-DISPELLER

LONDON is looking forward hopefully to the new "fog-dispeller" that has been invented by Signor Maggiora, to relieve the city of the dense fogs that frequently settle down and stop all traffic, except that which passes through the underground "tubes." A London fog once seen (you see nothing else when it arrives), is never forgotten. It is due, in great part, to the smoke belching from the thousands of chimneys being forced down with the damp and murky air. People get lost and teams become stalled sidewise in the streets, and all is confusion until the black pall of the fog lifts.

The Fog-Dispeller

Signor Maggiora's apparatus is composed of reservoirs of strong steel sheets, made in the form of a long horn, sixty feet high and six feet in diameter. Air waves will be shot out of the bell mouth by acetylene gas. Each shot will cost about fourteen cents. The inventor says that thirty shots will rend the dense fog and send it drifting off skyward.

London, without fog, would be greatly appreciated by the inhabitants. The fogs cost them thousands of dollars every year.

The inventor first made his experiments with a small model that cleared the smoke out of a jar in his laboratory.

PRISCILLA'S SONG (SEE ILLUSTRATION ON FIRST PAGE)

HE heard, as he drew near the door, the musical voice of Priscilla Singing the hundredth Psalm, the grand old Puritan anthem, Music that Luther sang to the sacred words of the Psalmist,
Full of the breath of the Lord, consoling and comforting many.
Then, as he opened the door, he beheld the form of the maiden
Seated beside her wheel, and the carded wool like a snowdrift
Piled at her knee, her white hands feeding the ravenous spindle, While with her foot on the treadle she guided the wheel in its motion.

Open wide on her lap lay the well-worn psalm-book of Ainsworth,
Printed in Amsterdam, the words and the music together,
Rough-hewn, angular notes, like stones in the wall of a churchyard, Darkened and overhung by the running vine of the verses.
Such was the book from whose pages she sang the old Puritan anthem,
She, the Puritan girl, in the solitude of the forest,
Making the humble house and the modest apparel of homespun
Beautiful with her beauty, and rich with the wealth of her being!

Music Lessons Free

IN YOUR OWN HOME.

A wonderful offer to every lover of music, whether a beginner or an advanced player.

Ninety-six lessons (or a less number if you desire) for either Piano, Organ, Violin, Guitar, Banjo, Cornet, Sight Singing or Mandolin will be given free to make our home study courses for these instruments known in your locality. You will get one lesson weekly, and your only expense during the time you take the lessons will be the cost of postage and the music you use, which is small. Write at once. It will mean much to you to get our free booklet. It will place you under no obligation whatever to us if you never write again. You and your friends should know of this work. Hundreds of our pupils write: "Wish I had known of your school before." "Have learned more in one term in my home with your weekly lessons than in three terms with private teachers, and at a great deal less expense." "Everything is so thorough and complete." "The lessons are marvels of simplicity, and my 11-year-old boy has not had the least trouble to learn." One minister writes: "As each succeeding lesson comes I am more and more fully persuaded I made no mistake in becoming your pupil."

We have been established nine years—have thousands of pupils from eight years of age to seventy. Don't say you cannot learn music till you send for our free booklet and tuition offer. It will be sent by return mail free. Address U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC, Box 7—225 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

CLOUDED BRAIN

Clears Up On Change to Proper Food

The brain cannot work with clearness and accuracy if the food taken is not fully digested, but is retained in the stomach to ferment and form poisonous gases, etc. A dull, clouded brain is likely to be the result.

A Mich. lady relates her experience in changing her food habits, and results are very interesting.

"A steady diet of rich greasy foods such as sausage, buckwheat cakes and so on, finally broke down a stomach and nerves that, by inheritance, were sound and strong, and medicine did no apparent good in the way of relief.

"My brain was cloudy and dull and I was suffering from a case of constipation that defied all remedies used.

"The 'Road to Wellville,' in some providential way, fell into my hands, and may Heaven's richest blessings fall on the man who was inspired to write it.

"I followed the directions carefully, physical culture and all, using Grape-Nuts with sugar and cream, leaving meat, pastry and hot biscuit entirely out of my bill of fare. The result—I am in perfect health once more.

"I never realize I have nerves, and my stomach and bowels are in fine condition. My brain is perfectly clear and I am enjoying that state of health which God intended his creatures should enjoy, and which all might have, by giving proper attention to their food." "There's a reason."

The Bowery Mission Bread Line

READERS of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD already know that the Bowery Mission must soon leave its present location. No. 55 Bowery has been taken over by the city for the purpose of an approach to the Manhattan Bridge. In a few weeks, this famous old place, hallowed by so many tender memories and sweet associations, will have vanished, and the mission's work will be carried on with renewed vigor in a building a few blocks higher up on the Bowery.

It was the sentiment associated with the fact that this would be the last Christmas celebration in the old place that probably caused the crowds to be so enormous. There was the fact also that owing to the panic the numbers of the unemployed had been so suddenly increased. Whatever the reason, it was, without doubt, the most largely attended festivity of any within the history of the Mission.

To begin with the Early Morning Breakfast at one A.M., the "line" began to form an hour before the time of opening. The air was cold and crisp, but not unpleasant. The stars shone in their far-away depths. Christmas had come! What would it mean to these denizens of the nether world? Would the light of the Bethlehem star penetrate the darkness of these gloom-struck hearts? As I passed down the line I came upon many men that I had known for years. Over and over again they had been told the story of "Jesus and his love." Surely they could not miss the deep and beautiful significance of Christmas! "Thou shalt call his name Jesus: for he shall save his people from their sins." Could the darkness and bitterness of this sin-stricken world find a truer exemplification anywhere than in this long line of shivering burden-bearers of the Bowery? And yet the stars above, the chiming of the distant church bells, the bright lights of the old Mission, and the spirit in the air were all proclaiming the advent of the King who was to bring deliverance.

Glory to God, Hosanna sing
Peace be on earth, good-will to men,
Glory to God, praises shall ring,
Praise to the New-born King.

"Greenie," the cripple, occupies quite an honorary position in the Bread Line. His poor twisted limbs and misshapen form, together with his imperturbable geniality, has secured for him sympathy, and a certain amount of deference, from his Bowery brethren. "Greenie" would be a great orator were it not for a hopeless impediment in his speech. He always has much to say, but cannot say it. He atones, however, for his want of utterance by remarkably expressive facial jerks and twists; and when they, too, are inadequate, he will passionately tear his cap from his head, and vigorously ruffle his hair as though he would transmit his thoughts by a frictional-magnetic hirsute process. He is always given the premier place in the Bread Line, and is handed carefully down the basement stairs before the rest come in.

When the doors were opened, in they came, old and young, tattered and battered, cold and shivering, and all of them desperately hungry. It did not seem so much of a mockery, after all, to wish them a "Happy Christmas;" for, once within the warm room, with the steaming coffee in one hand and a wholesome roll in the other, they really became genial, and you could not doubt their heartiness when they wished you a "Merry Christmas and many of 'em." What physical joy is there to compare with that of a hungry man who has at last something to eat?

At nine A. M. the family baskets were distributed. Lists had been carefully prepared and every endeavor had been made to find out who of the many that applied were the most needy. A brigade of strong, bright, cheerful Bowery Mission converts was on hand to help the recipients carry the baskets, each of which contained a fowl, vegetables, bread, pie, fruit, coffee, sugar, and condensed milk; and no misgivings entered our minds, but that they were going to places where, without them, a dreary mockery of a Christmas would have been spent.

In the Mission kitchen, volunteer workers were busy during the forenoon packing the dinners into the boxes for the evening meeting, and at two o'clock the doors were opened for the meeting of the Brotherhood of Bowery Mission Converts. This was one of the most remarkable meetings ever held within the Mission. The Brotherhood was formed last June, and meets every evening, half an hour before the regular meeting. It is composed of new converts, those just commencing to live a Christian life, and they are pledged to carry out in their daily lives the principles of a real brotherhood, a brotherhood in Christ. Of the hundred men present on Christmas day, there was not one who had not given evidence of the new life. Even those whose threadbare clothes and wan faces told of prolonged privation and severe suffering, were cheerful. The Christmas spirit was at work. On the platform were piles of useful clothing, shoes, shirts, underwear, pants, coats, vests, socks, etc., and one by one the men were taken to an inner room and fitted out with what they needed most.

Meanwhile, for two hours we tried to make them feel like boys at home. It was a family gathering. Mrs. Bird and Mrs. Hallimond were the only ladies present. Preaching, lecturing, and especially scolding, were forbidden. Peace, good will, and forgiveness prevailed. Contests in singing, reciting, and impromptu speech-making were indulged in.

Then came the evening meeting with a splendid programme and an enormous crowd. Some estimated that from five to eight thousand men sought admission. When every inch of space in the meeting hall was occupied, the basement was opened, and as many of the outside crowd as could be taken in were supplied with dinners. During the whole of the day, over four thousand meals were given. The meeting was an exceedingly effective one.

Victor Benke's memorial tablet was the only object in the room that was decorated, this loving act being performed by a New York lady out of respect to the memory of our sainted organist. The principal feature of the programme was its music, furnished by the Mission quartette, Mrs. and Miss Hallimond, Mr. Hunt, and Mr. Bryant. Miss Grace Hildebrand was also present and assisted. The Christmas hymn "Christ our King," which recently appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, words by Mr. John M. Morse, and music by G. H. Sandison, was sung by the Brotherhood. Although the tune was new to all, it was immediately taken up and sung most effectively by this Bowery crowd. Then followed the testimonies.

J. G. HALLIMOND, Superintendent.

Power for Service*

HOW implicitly Christ relied on the influence of prayer is apparent throughout the Gospels. Whatever theory we have of the relation between him and the Father, we cannot escape the conclusion that he derived strength from communion with God, and depended on that communion for his power for service. The conclusion is obvious: If he, with his divine nature, needed to pray, and even to spend whole nights in prayer, how much more need have ordinary men to pray?

*Topic of the Epworth League for January 19. "The Secret of Power for Service," Mark 1: 35-39; Luke 6: 12-16; Neh. 4: 3-6.

It is this union of the divine power working through the human power that is the hope of the church. There are two mistakes that men make in their view of the great work that the church has to do in the world. The one is to depend wholly on men and the other is to depend wholly on God. The moral reformer depending on his energy issues his tracts, addresses public meetings, organizes public movements, promotes legislation and is confident that, with rigorous laws well administered, men will become moral. Such work, when it is exclusively human, always fails. Men render perfunctory obedience for a time, but the old evils soon rear their heads again in a new form, and the agitation needs to be renewed. In common parlance, the lid cannot be kept down by force. On the other hand, the man who does nothing, but sits idly waiting for God to work a miracle to reform the world, waits in vain. God does not act in that way. He will use human power, he will not be a substitute for it. Man must work in reliance on the power that God will give. We speak of a general winning a battle, but the general would not have won if the army had not given him loyal support. On the other hand, the army could not have won without the general. It would have been a mere mob that could easily have been routed, if the general had not used his strategy. It is in the union of the general with the army that the secret of victory lay. This is the secret of the power of service. Dependence on the power that God gives in answer to believing prayer brings the blessing. Then service is powerful and triumphant.

God Speaking to Men*

IN studying the world around us, and still more in studying the worlds above us, the devout student hears the voice of God speaking to him. Nothing is more remarkable in this period of the world's history than the changed attitude of the masters of science. A century ago the teachers of geology, physical science and astronomy were classed as irreligious. It was not in all cases a correct classification, as we learn from some of the biographies that have appeared since they died, but their utterances gave color to the general opinion. In our day there has been a change; not only are the utterances more reverent, but the world has come to understand the scientists better. Even the evolutionist, who was once reckoned as the most prominent of all opponents of revelation, is now at some pains to show that he believes in God as the origin which evolution must have as the basis of his theories.

Thus, God gives us in nature a partial revelation of himself. The old notion of the world coming into existence by chance is recognized as absurd. There are provisions to meet certain needs, which must have been designed by some master mind. Just as in our own physical frames there is a provision that puts a limit to pain, by ordaining that when pain passes a certain point, the sufferer faints and becomes insensible, so there are provisions running through nature to meet special contingencies. All these are as clearly the device of a master mind as are those in the mechanism of a steam engine. The further we go in our studies, and the more discoveries we make, the more clearly do these evidences of design and foresight appear. God is speaking to us in these wonders, and the same lesson is taught by the microscope as by the telescope. That such a Being should give us a further revelation was to be expected. We have it in the Bible, which is the voice of God speaking to the soul. It supplies the key to God's character as it is manifested in the spiritual world, and it and nature, in spite of superficial discrepancies, are in strict accord.

Is Charmed with the Book

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I received the Calendar this forenoon and the book this afternoon. I like them both, but am particularly pleased with "Five Hundred Fascinating Animal Stories." I had thought of it as interesting the young people with whom I come in contact, but now I anticipate pleasant times in perusing it myself. It is a book that deserves wide circulation.

A COURSE IN ESPERANTO

By Our Esperanto Editor

LESSON No. I

WHY learn Esperanto? Because it will make it possible for you to converse and correspond with people of diverse tongues. It may also be of commercial value to you, as many business houses are coming to recognize its practicability. It will enable you to participate in world conventions, in which it is now frequently used. It will prove to be a good mental discipline. It will afford a most agreeable pastime and entertainment. It will help you to come up to the line of being an up-to-date person. There are no age limits for those who wish to study it. It is the easiest of all languages to acquire. After a very little study, it seems almost to become one's natural tongue, and one actually begins to think in Esperanto.

How to Study Esperanto. An individual can take it up by himself, but it is better to engage with others for practice. Let a family, or a company of students or of fellow boarders agree to have table talk in Esperanto.

Let Esperanto Circles be formed by the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Let those who do form such circles send a postal card to Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts, 206 Pennsylvania Avenue, S.E., Washington, D. C. Correspondence is not invited or desired, but occasionally postal-card communications will be asked for. It is suggested that these circles should meet once a week, and that a blackboard should be provided on which to write words or sentences given by dictation; also that writing may be placed on the blackboard to be read by members of the circle. This sort of sight-reading will make ready Esperantists.

How to Study. First learn to speak the letters aloud. They appear to be the same as in English, but many of the letters have quite different sounds. Until these sounds are entirely familiar, it will be impossible to acquire Esperanto.

Learn to pronounce words with proper accent.

Accent is Always Upon the Last Syllable But One. In case of words of two syllables, accent should be on the first syllable—never upon the last.

Aim to study aloud, because the ear and the tongue must be educated in Esperanto as well as the eye.

Write Esperanto as well. It will help to make knowledge more definite, and will aid the memory.

The Esperanto alphabet: A, B, C, Ĉ, D, E, F, G, Ĝ, H, Ĥ, I, J, K, L, M, N, O, P, R, S, Ŝ, T, U, Ŭ, V, Z.

Four letters we are accustomed to see in English are lacking—Q, W, X, Y.

Sounds of Letters

With the exception of the following, the letters have the same sound as in English:

A is always "a" as in father: ah.	Ŝ, as "sh" in she.
C, as "ts" in cats.	Ŭ, as "oo" in cool.
Ĉ, as "ch" in church.	Aŭ, as "ow" in how.
E, as "a" in bake.	Aj, as "i" in nigh.
G, as "g" in get.	Oj, as "o-wi" in sow-ing.
Ĝ, as "g" in gem.	Eŭ, as "eh-oo" in words "they who."
Ĥ, as "ch" in loch.	Ej, as "ayi" in say-ing.
I, as "ee" in feel.	Uj, as "ui" in ruin.
J, as "y" in yes.
Ŝ, as "z" in azure.
S, as "s" in basin.

There Are No Silent Letters.

Examples in pronunciation: Birdo, beer'do. Arbo, r'bo. Folio, fo-lee'o. Formiko, for-mee'ko. Mateno, mah-ta'no. Orelo, o-ra'lo. Skribi, skree'bee. Talio, tah-lee'o.

It has been thought best not to give the meaning of these words at present, in order that attention might be concentrated upon the pronunciation.

DEDICATION OF THE BENNINGTON MONUMENT

THIS week, officers, sailors, and soldiers to the number of several thousand, representing the army and navy of the United States, will dedicate a beautiful granite monument to the memory of fifty-seven of their comrades who lost their lives in the explosion of the boilers of the gunboat Bennington in the harbor of San Diego, Calif., July 21, 1905. The exercises are to be conducted under the personal direction of Rear-Admiral Goodrich. The cost of the memorial was borne by popular subscription.

This monument, a picture of which is shown herewith, is sixty-four feet high, and is placed on the plot of ground set aside as the last resting-place of the Bennington boys. It is on the summit of Point Loma, directly above Fort Rosecrans, and overlooks the Bay of San Diego, the ocean, parts of Mexico, and the mountainous region of Southern California. The unveiling of this tribute is looked forward to as an important and solemn occasion. A holiday will be proclaimed in the city of San Diego, and excursion trains will be run from all surrounding towns and cities.

The memorial committee in charge arranged for one of the longest and most imposing parades seen in California for many years.

Before January 7, the "pathfinder fleet" sailed in to join the cruisers Charleston, Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Louis, and the torpedo boats Paul Jones and Preble, now at San Diego, and, in addition to the crews of these vessels, there will be present hundreds of Uncle Sam's soldiers and artillery, all in full uniform. The people of the city decorated their houses and public buildings. G. H. H.

Personal Paragraph to All Readers:

Every lady reader of this paper ought to be interested in the offer made on this page. Here is a genuine Electric Seal Muff and Scarf, offered just for an effort. You may have seen pictures and handkerchiefs and such things offered just for an effort, but here is a genuine Electric Seal Fur Set, absolutely given away just for trying for a premium. Look at the picture of the Fur Set and ask yourself how can any lady "pass up" this offer when the complete set is given, not for any work, but just for answering this ad. and making an honest effort. This Set of Furs is not a premium. It really is FREE.

Besides the Furs there is a Set of Dishes. These dishes are not exactly free like the Fur set—it is a premium that you must earn with only a slight effort. You can earn it by a few hours' work. I know you can easily earn these dishes, and, anyway, you get the beautiful genuine Electric Seal Fur Set Free. Send your name and address to-day, either on the Coupon or send your name and address to-day in a letter; but write to-day to Mr. Balch.

LADIES!

Ladies, just write to-day for this elegant Electric Seal Fur Set, for which you might easily pay a handsome price if you had to buy it for cash. Just your name and address, and you will get this Set of Furs. Just for your effort and promptness in fulfilling the simple conditions of the offer below.

Remember, this beautiful Fur Set IS free. It is not a premium for which you must work—it is sent you free, prepaid, just for your promptness and your effort in our behalf. Our object in giving you this Set of Furs is because we want to introduce the dishes, which we illustrate below; but even if you do not earn the dishes, you get the Furs anyway just for trying. So send your name and address to-day—that is all we ask.

This Beautiful Fur Set is Free

Yes, we mean Free. Not a premium, but actually free, if you send your name and address at once in fulfilling these simple conditions of our great offer. Just send us your name and address and tell us you want the Set of Furs.

We will guarantee this Fur Set to be Genuine Electric Seal. We guarantee it to you to be very warm and beautiful, more substantial, more durable than many Fur Sets sold at high prices. It is only by special arrangement with the manufacturers, who want a few of these magnificent Sets introduced at once, that we are enabled to give this splendid Electric Seal Fur Set away with our magnificent and superb Set of Dishes.

An Honest Dinner Set Offer

A Real, high-grade, genuine Gold Medal Dinner Set. Not given away, but easily earned. When we say easily earned, we mean easily earned. We do not intend to give you this genuine Gold Medal Dinner Set for nothing. We want some of your time and some of your recommendation and some work from you. We do not want any canvassing nor peddling, but we want your help. We want just five hours' worth of your time, and you can give us your time in the evening or in any of your spare hours. If you haven't the time yourself, you can have your children help you. In fact your children can do all the work if you will only show them how.

Then this grand, glorious, genuine Gold Medal Dinner Set will be yours. It will be sent you absolutely free of charge to you, and you pay absolutely nothing for it. Not one penny of your money will we accept.

We cannot describe the beauty of this genuine Gold Medal Dinner Set, with its handsome decorations of Arbutus Blossoms in all their natural colors and its beautiful gold bands. We know that a great many dinner sets have been sold which are not up to expectations, and when we tell you that this is genuine Gold Medal China it ought to be enough. It ought to convince you that we mean what we say, that our offer is an honest one, and that when you have done the work for us, you will get this Dinner Set free. This grand Dinner Set is really worth your while, a Dinner Set of which you and your family will be proud—for this is not a cheap premium, but just the kind of a Dinner Set that you would buy at the store for a high price.

There are twenty-five pieces in this beautiful set. It is not as large a set as some people claim to give you, but we know you would rather have fewer dishes of a very higher grade than a lot of poor grade china, and as we do not want to ask too much of your time, and do not want to keep you busy on our little work for more than an evening or two, we are offering this 25-piece set. If you or your children can put in more time, or more work, we will give you larger sets, even a 176-piece set of genuine Gold Medal China. But of the china that we do give you, the 25 pieces or more, will be of the highest genuine Gold Medal grade.

I know you want that kind of china on your table. I want you to have the very best china—the kind of china used in the home of rich people. I want you to have it and enjoy it, and I want you to picture to yourself how your table will look set with the beautiful genuine Gold Medal China. Look closely at this picture of the dishes. See the fine wild rose decorations—a picture can hardly do justice to the set, but you can get a faint idea of the beauty of the dishes by looking at the picture.

See the gold—the rich deep gold effect—the pure white alabaster quality. All those marks which have distinguished this china won for it the Gold Medal at the St. Louis World's Fair. This was the only china that won the Gold Medal at the World's Fair. Even though you become very rich and have the finest kind of house furnishings you will always be proud to entertain your friends with this Dinner Set. You can truthfully and honestly tell your friends that this is the only china that won the Gold Medal at the St. Louis Exposition. You can show them the Gold Medal mark of quality on every set.

Now do you want this Dinner Set?—this beautiful, genuine Gold Medal Dinner Set, just for a few of your spare hours? Would not your children, or your neighbors or some of the members of your family be willing to help you on the little work we ask? Everybody is just crazy to get this great 25c offer. Get 14 friends to accept your offer, and both the Fur Set and Dinner Set are yours—FREE. Our offer is limited.

Just Your Name and Address

Just your name and address on this Coupon or on a postal card, or in a letter, will be enough. We will promptly send you the wonderful 25c offer plan, so that you can earn the beautiful, genuine Gold Medal Dinner Set. If you decide that you cannot do the work there is no harm done—just return the material, and you will be under no obligations whatever. We do not ask you to sign any order or any contracts. Just your name and address, and we will send you everything prepaid, and it will cost you nothing. "Thinking about it" does not earn you any Gold Medal Dinner Set. Send your name and address to-day. Remember, the Electric Seal Fur Set free anyway, just for trying, as is fully explained in our circular. Our Money-Saving Combinations

American Boy

A PROFUSELY illustrated monthly for boys, with nearly a quarter of a million readers. Without question the most entertaining and practical boys' magazine in the world. Clean and high grade. Covers in colors; big pages. Serials by Munroe, Stratemeyer, Alger, Harbour, Tomlinson, Trowbridge, Ellis, Shute, and other prominent writers. Boy hobbies, such as stamps, coins, photography, amateur journalism, puzzles, mechanics, electricity, biography, athletics exploited. Prize essays by boys—cartoons on boy subjects—also badges for excellence in school work and for heroism. It preaches the religion of "do" and not that of "don't." Approved by parents and educators. Enthusiastically supported by boys everywhere.

American Magazine

IS turned out by the most illustrious group of editorial workmen that has yet been assembled to make a magazine. Toiling together with heart and soul and mind, they write the best that can be written, and get from other pens the best that can be gotten—literature that lives and breathes and spurs to better living—illustrations that are true to life and nature.

They are John S. Phillips, editor-in-chief, formerly of McClure's Magazine; Ida M. Tarbell, F. P. Dunne ("Mr. Dooley"), Ray Stannard Baker, Lincoln Steffens and William Allen White.

Mr. Dooley will appear exclusively in every issue of The American Magazine in 1908—that's reason enough for adding it to your list.

Cosmopolitan

NO matter how many magazines you take, Cosmopolitan is the one you cannot afford to do without. Its subscribers of last year are subscribers this year—with their friends. They'll be subscribers next year—with their friends' friends. This, after all, is the real test of a magazine's merit—that its readers tell their friends about it. You can be sure that in 1908 one feature in each issue will be of such universal interest as to dominate the magazine world for that month. As single instances, take Cosmopolitan's great series of brilliant short stories by Oppenheim, or the remarkably popular "Wolfville Tales" of Alfred Henry Lewis. "The best—no matter what it costs," is the motto which makes Cosmopolitan resemble no other magazine but Cosmopolitan.

Good Housekeeping

GOOD HOUSEKEEPING is a richly illustrated magazine for all the family. It is, moreover, the most practical of the household magazines, and at the same time one of the brightest, most refreshing periodicals for general reading. It tells not how things should be done, but in a breezy way how they have been done by clever people. It is woman's best resource in the daily perplexities of home management, and is the court of ultimate appeal for things domestic. In a word, it is a cheery, helpful companion for the entire household, for it is the meeting ground of hundreds of practical, inspiring writers. It is issued monthly and reaches no less than a million readers. Whatever magazines you take, Good Housekeeping should be one of them.

Harper's Bazar

FOR forty-one years Harper's Bazar has been the leading American authority on fashion, good form, and entertainment. It will continue to be an invaluable household guide and assistant.

Harper's Bazar is made for all refined American women. Such women are its most ardent admirers, whether their incomes are large or small, whether their scale of living is simple or complex, whether they dwell in towns or in the country.

Harper's Bazar preaches economy, rational domestic economy—and wise spending. Harper's Bazar preaches simplicity—the simplicity of sane, wholesome, rational living. Harper's Bazar preaches progress—progress in the kitchen, in the nursery, and in every other home department.

Little Folks

A BEAUTIFULLY illustrated monthly magazine for young children. Mothers and fathers who wish to provide the very best reading and pictures for their young children, that will be read and re-read, and looked at and looked at, welcome Little Folks. It is a story-teller, a picture book, a playfellow, an out-of-school magazine. Its fun is of a simple, sunny sort. Its little tales of children possess an ethical value—they stimulate their readers and hearers to be fearless, cheerful, unselfish, and above all true and honorable. All stories of a painful kind are excluded, especially such as would haunt nervous and imaginative children. There is much curious and interesting natural history, also play work for little fingers.

McClure's Magazine

THE Magazine in a vast country like the United States—where the dimensions are those of a continent—has an influence almost unlimited. It reaches as many thinking people on the west coast as on the east, in the South as in the North. The Paris press controls France; the London press controls England; but only the magazine is big enough to reach all America—such a field is beyond the scope of the greatest daily ever published.

McClure's Magazine was the first periodical to realize this great responsibility, and the first to make the monthly periodical a vital influence in good government and good citizenship—an instrument to help a great, wide-spread people understand itself and its possibilities.

Pearson's Magazine

DESTRUCTIVE journalism has had its day. Fair-minded conservatism is now having its inning. For almost two years Pearson's has been consistently constructive in its editorial policies. Now there have come to be imitators; but Pearson's remains—the leader.

In fiction, too, Pearson's has its distinctive quality. It is famous everywhere as the creator of Captain Kettle, Monsieur A. V., Don Q., Randolph Mason and Captain Romaine.

A novelty feature for the coming year is a light sociological study in verse, entitled "The Seven Stages of Unrest," by Carolyn Wells, exquisitely illustrated by Wallace Morgan—the creators of the famous "Fluffy Ruffles."

Review of Reviews

IN the coming Presidential election year, with its tense interest in the trusts, the tariff, the railroads, politics generally and political personages, the Review of Reviews will be doubly valuable to you. With Dr. Albert Shaw's monthly "Progress of the World"; with the cartoon history of the month; with the timely contributed articles on just the questions you are interested in; with the gist of the really important articles of all the other magazines of the world served up to you, and the reviews of new books—you can keep intelligently up with the times at a minimum cost of time, effort and money.

In the Review of Reviews you not only get the best informed, most timely and useful magazine in the world, but you also get over and above all the other periodicals, or just the part you need.

Success Magazine

THE investigation by Success Magazine of the opium curse in India, China and Japan, and of the responsibility of Great Britain and British traders for its extension against pitiful protests of the Chinese Government, who foresaw the inevitable demoralization of all classes of their people—forms the strongest, most important and most far-reaching work done by any American magazine for many years. Success has spent nearly $10,000 in making this investigation, sending Samuel Merwin—its special representative—for a six months' residence in the Orient for this purpose; and the first of this series of articles appears in Success for October, 1907. Also the beginning of "Lentala"—a new serial story of adventure—and the first of several articles on "The Real Thomas W. Lawson."

Woman's Home Companion

THE Woman's Home Companion gives to its readers each month as much good fiction as the story magazines, as much first-class art work as the picture magazines, more authoritative articles of interest to women than any other publication, and in addition a complete magazine of helpful departments, serving every practical need of the American woman.

Dr. Edward Everett Hale retains his position at the head of the Companion's editorial staff. Mrs. Sangster, Jack London, Madame Nordica, Paderewski, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, whose greatest novel is just beginning in the magazine, and the author of Eben Holden, are a few of the distinguished contributors to the 1908 Companion.

World To-Day (The)

THE only magazine of its class sold at a popular price. The World To-Day is a monthly world review, but is not made up of clippings of other publications. It obtains its information from original sources, and is reliable and up-to-date. Its contributors are the foremost men and women of the day. The reader will find in it recreation for the idle hour, and best of all—something worth while. Many illustrations are in colors. All other magazines of its class sell at $3. The World To-Day is but $1.50. Its remarkable quality and low price make it an exceptional bargain, and we recommend it strongly to our readers.

The Recovery of the World-Conquering Hittite Empire Which Flourished Three Thousand Years Ago

By PROF. EDGAR J. BANKS

SCARCELY a generation ago, the extreme critics were claiming that the nation called "the Hittites" in the Bible never existed. We are told that Abraham bought the grave of Machpelah from a Hittite for four hundred shekels of silver; that Esau married three Hittite women — Judith, Bashemath and Ada; that King David married Bathsheba, the widow of Uriah the Hittite; that Hittite armies were employed as mercenaries to fight for the Hebrew kings, and that, later, the Hittites were compelled to pay a tax to the Hebrews or leave Palestine. In spite of these and a score of other passages in which the Hittites are mentioned, the critics continued to assert that the Hittites never existed.

A Double-Headed Sphinx

When the Egyptian hieroglyphics upon the temple at Karnak were deciphered, they told of the wars which the Ramses of the Bible fought with the Hittites. Accompanying the inscriptions were sculptures showing Ramses fighting single-handed with the Hittite warriors. Another inscription from the same temple recorded a copy of a treaty, according to which the Egyptians and Hittites were never again to make war upon each other; the treaty was almost modern in its conception. The critics then began to think; yet they maintained that it must all be a mistake, for the Hittite nation never existed.

When the palaces of the Assyrian kings were excavated at Khorsabad and Nimrud, and the inscriptions upon the stones which lined their walls were read, the Hittites were also mentioned there. A clay tablet from Nineveh, relating the story of the birth of the old king Sargon (3800 B.C.), speaks of the Hittites, but perhaps the tablet does not come from that early age. Tiglathpileser, of 1100 B.C., mentions the Hittites. Assurnasirpal, of 884 B.C., says that he collected tribute from the Hittite kings, and the Assyrian king Sargon boasts that in the year 711 B.C. he captured the capital city of the Hittites and destroyed it. With all of these evidences, from the Bible, from the Egyptian monuments and from the palaces of the Assyrian kings, the critics at last acknowledged that, after all, the Hittites did exist. We now know the Hittites once had large, fortified, walled cities, that their trained and well-armed soldiers well-nigh conquered the ancient world, and that they possessed a written language and a developed art.

The soil of Western Asia is filled with the ruins of long-forgotten nations, forgotten because they passed away before the historians of Greece and Rome began to write; yet one by one their names are at last coming to light. The most recent of the newly recovered peoples are the Hittites. They once possessed four capital cities, three of which have been explored and partially excavated; the fourth, the Biblical Kadesh, once standing upon an island of the Orontes, probably lies buried beneath the waves of the modern lake Kedes.

The Hittite Empire included the greater part of Asia Minor, from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates, for Hittite sculptures are found cut into the rocks at the pass of Karabel, not far from Smyrna; they are scattered throughout Phrygia, south of the modern Eski-shehir; a huge rock sculpture is at Ivriz, near Tarsus, the birthplace of Paul; Eyuk and Boghazkeui, south of Marsavan, were Hittite capital cities; also Tel-Barsip and Karkemish, on the Euphrates. Stone sculptures with Hittite figures, which were found built into the walls of the houses of Marash, Hamath and Aleppo, show that Hittites once lived there. Numbers of Hittite seals have been found in the ruins of Nineveh, and a large Hittite monument from the ruins of Babylon indicates that Hittite influence was exerted even in that distant country.

The ruins of the largest, and perhaps the oldest, of the Hittite cities are called Boghazkeui by the modern Turks, who inhabit a little village near its ancient walls. The ancient Greeks called the place Pteria, but the earlier Hittite name we have yet to learn. Boghazkeui is almost the only ancient city of Asia Minor which was not later occupied by the Greeks and buried beneath the ruins of their buildings. During the past year Dr. Winkler, of Berlin, has been excavating there and bringing to light many details of this long-lost civilization. The old Hittite city was large, considering the age in which it flourished, for it was a mile and a quarter long, and half as broad. Few cities of an equal age surpassed it in size. The walls were fourteen feet thick. Several narrow gateways, scarcely three feet wide, pierced the walls, and at one point was a postern gate which led into the city by means of an arched passage beneath the walls. Within the city are the remains of several ancient buildings, as castles and palaces, and large rock-hewn cisterns for the storage of water. At least one inscribed stone appears above the surface.

Dr. Winkler's excavations failed to reveal large sculptured stones, such as are found in the ruins of the Assyrian palaces; but instead, he discovered more valuable objects. In a trench along the foundation wall of the palace he found about five thousand clay tablets, resembling those of nearly every ruin of Babylonia and Assyria, and, like them, covered with cuneiform or wedge-shaped characters. Upon some the language is Assyrian; upon others the groups of wedges were used to express the still undeciphered language of the Hittites. It is reported that one of the Assyrian tablets contained a copy of the famous treaty which was written in hieroglyphics upon the walls of the temple of Karnak. When these Hittite tablets shall be read, we may be introduced to the literature of that mysterious nation. Continued on page 11

A Hittite Religious Procession

THE American Pulpit

A SERMON BY

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, D.D.*

PROV. 3: 33

"He blesseth the habitation of the just"

WE spoke in a former sermon of a few things which are fundamental to a true family life. The great basis upon which it all rests we said was the religious. Without that, any family life would be imperfect, no matter how beautiful and full of adornment it might otherwise be. With that as a foundation, all else worth while might be safely built up. The statement was made that the home should be made the most attractive and beautiful place in the world. We were speaking also of some of the ways in which a family could make home attractive.

It is well understood, of course, that all families do not have an equal opportunity for development so far as earthly possessions are concerned; but there is a common fallacy, which has endured through the centuries, and which is to be found in our own generation: that happiness and power and development are dependent upon environment and wealth. Daniel grew into a tower of spiritual strength in the midst of heathenism with the worst possible environment. So have other men who have realized the fact of God in their lives.

Wealth Not Essential

There are in this city many families whose circumstances are widely different when it comes to their possessions. Some families live in large houses and some in small. Some have more than enough in the way of income; others are continually pinched to find enough to meet the demands. Yet it would not be exaggeration to say that some of the families living in the big houses have failed to establish real homes. Measured by the standard we have laid down—that is, that the home should be the most attractive place in the world—there are many families in this town and in every town in the United States where the children do not find it so. They go away from their homes for entertainment. They leave their own fathers and mothers and go elsewhere for what father and mother should give them; and that not because there is a lack of wealth or culture, but because there is a lack of the real thing which makes the home the first place on earth.

We would also recognize the fact that in many homes where there are good fathers and mothers, the toil of life adds to the burden of making the home attractive. What, for example, can a mother do in the evening for her boys and girls when she has been working all day at physical labor, and after the work of the house is finished finds herself too tired in body to amuse or entertain her children? What shall we say of the conditions where the father has worked hard all day, and finds his body exhausted with the exercise so that he has little vigor or vitality left to furnish what we call the attractive side of life for children? And yet while we recognize these difficulties, and they are great, it is nevertheless true that in many homes where father and mother are both wage-earners, we find that somehow they have succeeded in establishing a real home life. If these families can do that with the handicap of physical exhaustion and the minimum of things at their disposal, what excuse has any family with leisure and means if it fails to make the home what it ought to be?

Personal Testimony

I can not remember myself any time in my own boyhood when there was any place either in country or city which had a greater "pulling" power in the way of genuine attraction than my own home. I am sure we could never boast of any superfluity of riches. We lived in a log house of two rooms for several years. We had what would be called the necessities of life, but beyond that a very small margin. We were all working people. The father worked in the field and the mother in the kitchen, and the boys in both places; and I cannot recall a single condition in the way of counter-attraction which at any time rivaled in our thought the attraction of the home. And this leads naturally to a statement of the things which make homes attractive whether they be built up around great possessions or few.

It is astonishing how many things there are in this world which do not have to be bought, which minister to the soul's development, and allure it by their beauty and their interest. If one lives in the country there is the whole study of nature. I knew one farmer's family in Vermont, that had no more possessions than any other, on a bleak hillside farm, where the children were trained from infancy to love the things which belonged to God's world. They studied flowers and leaves and acorns, and the habits of animals. Three of these children graduated from a Chautauqua course.

How Boys are Lost

They were six miles from a post-office and two hundred miles from Boston. A family in the adjoining township with the same opportunity missed it altogether. The children of that farmer could be found loafing around the little grocery store in town, spending their evenings in senseless gossip with other neighbors, growing up ignorant and illiterate. They plowed the fields but never studied the soil; they talked about the weather, but never knew what made the clouds. The family of which I spoke first drew in its culture and made the home attractive at the minimum of cost. They saved what strength they had after the toil of the day for the culture of their minds, and found that, after all, they had a surplus with wise economy. In spite of the weakness of the flesh, they found out how much could be done in what we call the odd moments of life.

In this connection much can be done by true fathers and mothers in observing the natural tastes, habits and inclinations of their children. If a boy takes to reading early, along that track may be his ultimate salvation. If he takes to a musical instrument, it is not difficult to take advantage of that fact. If he is a natural scientist, that is a hint as to the things which will interest him as he develops. Many a man has lost his boy by being willing to spend for his own club life fifty to a hundred dollars a year, and being unwilling to give his boy a chemical laboratory, or start him out to study an electric machine fixed up in the basement or attic. It would not be exaggeration to say that many men in this town have lost their boys by letting them wander on the streets nights. They are filling the vaudeville, and are seeking excitement and interest anywhere except at home, simply because father or mother has failed to provide for them in the home circle what would have been perfectly easy and comparatively cheap if the father and mother had been willing to study the boy as hard as they study their own selfish inclinations.

It is no more than fair to say that no home can be made the most attractive place on earth without an effort. There is nothing we have got that is good for anything that was acquired without an effort; even salvation is not free. I do not care what the old hymn says about it. It is not free in the sense that we do absolutely nothing to get it. Salvation in its largest sense is character, and character is the result of daily conflict, of daily bearing the cross; so the home of which we are speaking in order to be the most attractive place on earth requires effort on the part of the father and mother.

I think this cannot be over-emphasized when we remember the vast number of attractions which tend to destroy the home circle and break it up into fragments. There is the club which pulls father and mother away. There is the church which rightfully demands a large part of Sunday, and a night or two of the week. There is the theatre with its undoubtedly alluring temptation to all young life. I firmly believe that we should protect our homes in the most sacred manner possible from these constant incursions into them, and the problem of how to make and retain the attractiveness of the home is one which every good father and mother should attempt to solve, no matter how hard the circumstances may be. There is nothing which will repay hard work like this labor for the child, for he is worth saving. If he is worth keeping off the street; if he is worth training into a permanent and righteous citizen, we might almost say it would pay literally for father and mother to lay down their lives for this end. I think, myself, that the parents are the ones most to blame where boys and girls run the streets night after night. When they find any place in town more interesting than their own homes, the blame should not rest on them, but where it rightfully belongs—on those who brought them into the world and who are solemnly responsible for their training in life.

I do not believe that in a town like this there is any call for the Church to set up any counter-attractions. We may do our part as we should in the way of supplementing life, in helping to enrich the home and develop the family. That is what the Church is for, but we are under no obligation to furnish attractions, amusements and entertainments in order to get people out from their homes. It is the first duty of every family to make its own inner circle the one great and attractive spot in the place, and it is not impossible of accomplishment where the father and mother have based their family life on the religious idea, where they really love their children, and look upon them as parts of the kingdom of God; but it is a sad fact that so many parents should seem to think everything of the little baby when it comes into the world and care almost nothing for the boy of twelve or thirteen. They are perfectly willing to let him run the streets; to learn bad habits; to grow up disobedient and wilful. What can they expect in the end if a crop is reaped from the seed which has been sown?

It must be borne in mind that the real attractiveness of the home does not, in the end, depend upon the number of costly things put as toys in the hands of our children. If there is any pitiful sight on earth, it is the sight of a nursery stuffed full of luxurious machine-made toys, lavished upon children who rapidly tire of each new possession. The child of the poorest laborer, making mud pies in the back-yard, is more happy than some child of the very rich who is possessed of a thousand-dollar toy battleship. Those parents who have little to do with, but who have ideals of the allurements of the family circle, need not be afraid by comparison of the rich man's house.

The same thing is also true of the failure to assume the proper duties in the religious training of the child. Families who have no family worship, who never read the Bible, who never teach their children to pray, send their children to church and Sunday School and then blame the Church when their children are irreverent or when they grow up with scant knowledge of the Bible and of God. The Church is loaded down with a great burden of other people's children. There are homes where religious instruction has been reduced to a scientific minimum. Then when humanity becomes lawless, when the streets are full of boys and girls, not playing in them as the prophet describes those in the New Jerusalem, but loafing in them to no good, the church is blamed for not being aggressive, and men who have failed in their duty toward the religious instruction of their own children grow very indignant as they score the Church and the preacher for lack of zeal. If the homes of this country did their duty to their children in the matter of religious instruction the churches could do vastly more of real missionary work.

The Family Older than the Church

I grant the great and important place of the Church in the life of the world. It was organized for the express purpose of bringing a knowledge of Christ into the world. Its Sunday Schools, its Endeavor Societies, its prayer-meetings, its missionary organizations, all have for their motto the salvation of men. Every true church should act on the terms of the great commission; go out into the world and make disciples of all the nations. That is what it is here to do, and it has no excuse for doing anything else; but the family is older than the Church. As an institution it is first in the life of organized society. The father is the priest. His children are and should be more to him than they can be to the pastor of any church. The father and mother bear closer relations to them on the religious side than any superintendent of missions was ever expected to bear; and the Church is called upon to assume a burden which it was never intended to carry

Rio Janeiro, where our Battleships will Make the Next Stop

AMERICA'S great battleship fleet completed the first run of its long cruise to the Pacific when it entered the beautiful harbor of Port of Spain, in the island of Trinidad, and the anchors dropped from the sides of the white hulls and gripped the earth for a stay of several days. The trip from Norfolk had been made over a sea that was as calm as a mountain lake on a quiet summer day. No one, not even the latest recruit, to whom life on board ship was a novelty, had the slightest excuse for being seasick. The white hulls stood up "straight as a church" and kept their distances excellently, and the maneuvers that were ordered from Admiral Evans' flagship, the Connecticut, were carried out with admirable quickness and precision. Part of the time the fleet sailed in single line, then in double column.

Trinidad is a British possession, and the governor welcomed Admiral Evans and his fleet with great cordiality. He gave a banquet and a reception for the officers at the Government House, to which all the dignitaries of Trinidad were invited. The officers of the battleships were very glad to spend some time on shore, and ball games made up of officers, who had not forgotten their old student days at Annapolis, played a long-anticipated game of baseball. The crews were given liberal shore leave, and their bearing was such as to greatly please their commander. They were as orderly as any of the regular residents, and the British governor sent a letter to the fleet commending the conduct of the American crews. The sailors all seemed to be imbued with the determination that no disgrace should come to "Old Glory" through any act of theirs.

Before leaving the Port of Spain, the ships refilled their coal bunkers and put everything in shape for the second part of the run. This second run was from Trinidad to Rio de Janeiro, a distance of 2,900 miles, the longest section of the trip, with the exception of the fifth, which will be from Callao to Magdalena Bay. These two are over 3,000 miles apart. The run to Rio de Janeiro was practically across the torrid zone, and the ships skirted the coasts of five countries. They left the Gulf of Para by way of the Serpent's Mouth, then they steamed along off the shores of Venezuela, British, Dutch and French Guiana, and then along the Brazilian coast. Off the mouth of the River Amazon the fleet steamed for over a hundred miles through fresh water.

The South American countries are growing more friendly every day toward the United States, realizing how much they owe to her protection, and American official visitors are certain of a warm welcome. The visit of the fleet to South America greatly pleased Brazil and her neighbors, and the resulting good feeling is well worth the expense involved in sending the fleet around to the Pacific.

The programme arranged by the Brazilians, which was sent to Washington, shows how cordially they feel. President Penna will entertain all of the American Admirals, a number of the officers, and Irving B. Dudley, the American Ambassador, at the Palace at Petropolis.

Already Peru, on the West Coast, has heard of what Brazil has been doing, and has gone to work at once to propose a welcome that will equal anything that has been done before. President Pardo and the Minister of Marine have already sent out twelve hundred invitations to their fellow Peruvians to meet the officers of the American fleet. Every American officer will receive as a souvenir of his visit a handsome album.

Two miles east of the city of Boghazkeui rises a huge limestone rock to the height of 540 feet. Upon its summit are two recesses, one reaching ninety feet into the rock, and the other forty-two; and upon the walls of the recesses are sculptured more than a hundred strange Hittite figures. Some are marching inward. There are short figures with clenched hands; others who are bearing weapons; still others standing upon the heads of birds, animals and men. All excepting one are of men; that one exception is of a woman, probably the queen goddess whom the Hittites worshiped.

Five hours north of Boghazkeui, and beneath the modern village of Eyuk, lies the ruin of another Hittite city, said by some to have been the summer home of the Hittite kings. Approaching the hill, one sees along its edge large sculptured stones, portraying another Hittite religious procession. One man is playing upon a musical instrument, another is climbing a ladder, a third is leading a sheep to the altar. The procession is moving toward the gate to the temple beyond. The temple gate-posts, huge stones sculptured in the form of sphinxes, are still standing, and upon one of them a stork now makes its home. Of the Hittite temple beyond all that appears above ground are a few of its foundation stones. What treasures the soil beneath may conceal, one can only imagine.

From the many sculptures from Boghazkeui, Eyuk and Karkemish, and the rock sculptures scattered throughout Asia Minor, we are at last able to describe these ancient peoples. The Hittites were a short, stocky race, with long, straight hair, which they braided, and allowed to fall down behind. From the Egypttian monuments we know that their skin was yellowish. Their foreheads were receding; their large eyes were somewhat oblique; the prominent nose was aquiline, and suggestive of the Armenian; the lips were thick and heavy. Their one garment was a short-sleeved tunic reaching to the knees and fitting the body but loosely. The gown of the priest was somewhat longer and fringed at the bottom, while the dress of the women reached to the ankles. Men and women alike wore armlets and anklets, and the women wore necklaces and belts and rings upon the fingers and in the ears.

The favorite weapon was a long, straight sword, carried in the belt; frequently the sword seems to have been curved near its hilt. There was the long spear; and the shield consisted of two circular parts held together by means of a handle. In hunting the lion, the bow and arrow were employed; and the Hittites, like the Assyrian kings, were fond of the chase. They rode in chariots that were almost identical in construction with those of the ancient Greeks. The modern Oriental possesses neither chair, nor table, nor bedstead; yet from the sculptures we know that the Hittites sat upon chairs which were like our own in shape.

We know as yet very little of the Hittite religion, yet the Assyrian inscriptions tell us the names of some of the Hittite gods. The altar from Eyuk teaches us that the Hittites sacrificed to their deities.

Just who the Hittites were or to what race of people they belonged, we are not certain; possibly they were Semites, though they are generally called Turanians. At the remote age when the Hebrews were entering Palestine, the Hittites had reached the height of their power, and were even then on the decline. Rawlinson believed that the mysterious Hyksos or "shepherd kings" of Egypt were Hittites. More than three thousand years ago the Hittite power extended throughout Asia Minor and Palestine. It was checked by the rising Assyrians, who sent one expedition after another against the Hittites and compelled them to pay tribute. Finally, in 711 B.C., when Karkemish, the capital city, was destroyed by Sargon, the Hittite empire came to an end, and the Hittites disappeared from history. What became of the survivors we do not know.

The language of the Hittites was picture-writing, and one may recognize among the strange characters a jumping rabbit, an ox head, a human face or arm, baskets, shields, stools, pots, and many other objects. In the later inscriptions, the characters bear little resemblance to the objects which they represent, and had the nation not been brought to an early end, the pictures might have developed into an alphabet.

Not a word of their language can be read with certainty. Well-known scholars, Sayce, Conder, Campbell, Jensen and others, claim an ability to read the peculiar signs. Some of the translations are serious efforts by faithful scholars, who have persuaded themselves that they have found the key to the language. Other Hittite translations are fraudulent, made with intent to deceive.

Thus a nation which played a prominent part in Old Testament history, but to which the scholar of a few years ago denied an existence, is slowly resuming its place in history. Another voice from beneath the soil of Asia is calling out its testimony to the truth of the Old Testament history.

A NEW WORLD FOR THE SIGHTLESS

The Splendid Work of the New York Association for the Blind

IF, amidst the din and turmoil of the crowded metropolis, a blind man should ask any stranger to help him cross the crowded roadway and land him safely outside the traffic which in his helplessness endangers his life, and to put him again on the road which he could safely follow, there is probably not an inhabitant of New York who would not at least feel an impulse to give him a guiding hand. Three-quarters of the entire number of the blind in New York State lose their sight after school age. A large proportion of them are poor and many have lost their money in a futile attempt to save their failing eyesight. Until the formation of the New York Association for the Blind, there was no organization in the State to give the man suddenly stricken blind a hand to lead him safely through the dangers of discouragement and helplessness to a point where he could safely look after himself again.

A Blind Toy-Maker

The City only offered him the poorhouse, a Home for the Indigent Blind supported by private charity, or a pension of about $50 a year, provided he had no other means of support. No blind person can make a successful start in the world without money, or without that education which enables him to get it. Therefore, primarily, for these helpless men and women, whom disease or accident had deprived of sight, and who had to learn much before they could again take their part in the work and pleasure of the community, the New York Association was formed.

Investigation through years of study in all parts of the globe has led us to adopt the best means to prevent unnecessary blindness, and to help the unavoidably blind to help themselves. The Association is constantly investigating and inventing new and useful activities. Its factory, classes, clubs, information bureau, etc., are doing good work. The Association wishes to be always receptive for fresh ideas to aid in carrying out its task. It wishes the public to consider seriously the needs for this work; the propriety and humanity of helping to prevent the thirty per cent. of needless blindness which is the result of criminal carelessness or ignorance, and of making the lives of the blind useful and happy; and the economic reasonableness, apart from all sentiment, of minimizing the cases of blindness, and of training these blind people, who have hitherto been unhappy economic drags, to become contented wage-earners. This can only be done if the necessary financial support is extended. Co-operation of all kinds, criticisms and suggestions are welcomed, and the offices and salesrooms and class-rooms at 118 East Fifty-ninth Street, as well as the factory for blind men at 147 East Forty-second Street, New York, are always open for inspection.

Blind men and women are not permitted to work together, and their intermarriage, which is apt to be disastrous, is discouraged.

The immediate needs of the Association are larger buildings, which would include grounds where the blind workmen and women could have plenty of exercise and fresh air; maintenance and equipment of classes for men and women; running expenses for the office building, for the salesroom and the class and club-rooms, for industrial instructors' salaries, and for various other necessary expenses in the conduct of the work, including the purchase of books for the blind and also for crude materials to be made into marketable articles by the sightless workers.

A young blind man formerly in the almshouse, but now a busy, self-supporting worker, said: "I feel as though I had been born into a new world, since being taught to work and be no longer dependent on charity."

when fathers and mothers throw upon it the responsibility for all the religious training of their children. I would venture to say that practically all the most efficient church workers, Sunday School teachers, missionaries and evangelists who have grown up in the Church have had their first start towards God and religious things, not in the Church, but in the home.

Mutual Relations

There are duties also which the family cannot escape in the matter of its relation to its neighborhood. We cannot build high stone walls around our houses that will shut our neighbors entirely out. The neighbor's boy and our boy are parts of society. Whether we like it or not they rub up together in the public schools and on the playground, going and coming. They know each other far better than their fathers know each other. These men go home too late in the evening to see each other. They eat their suppers and read their papers and go and come strangers, but the boys are together. The relation of one home to another in a community is very often of such a serious character that an entire neighborhood is disturbed because of a failure to recognize the duties of a neighborhood. One woman said to me a short time ago: "My boy would be perfectly contented to stay home nights and be happy in his home, if it were not for my neighbor's boy, who goes out after supper and whistles for him to come out." That same remark raises the question of the duty of the family to its neighborhood. What right has the parent of one boy to allow his child to be the destroyer of the peace of another? Those who allow their children great freedom in the matter of street education, who do not train them in habits of reverence and obedience and cleanliness of thought and speech, are doing vast harm to other families. As sacred as a home life is by itself, it cannot exist by itself. We are not living on desert islands, each one having a desert island of his own.

So the neighbor's boy becomes a factor, and sometimes a very serious one, in the home problem. We should learn the everlasting lesson that no man liveth to himself, and no family can exist by itself. Each family ought to consider itself as belonging to a community. Whatever is for the best good of the whole community should govern the units of it. We observe this practice in all departments of social life, and the family life is not an exception to the rule.

The home life also has a duty which it owes to the State. The neighborhood in one sense is a small circle of social obligation, but there is a distinct duty which every home in a city owes to the entire city. It is at this point that many homes break down and repudiate all responsibility. This is the reason why what are called cultured and respectable families are often ciphers when it comes to real questions of duty as it touches the life of a whole town or community. The sacred privileges of the home usurp the sacred duties of the home. There are calls which take men out of their homes, when the city life demands the co-operation of every true father, and the real home life of the nation cannot be well established unless sometimes men are willing to deny themselves the very privileges and comforts of their own homes. If the other man's home is going to be like yours in its comfort, in its sobriety, in its quietness, you must be willing to give of your business and your happiness in the way of sharing; for every home in the world is dependent, in a very true sense, on every other. The culture of the college-bred man does not release him from this duty. The scholarship of the university man, his love of seclusion, his love of the beautiful, cannot release him from this obligation. There come times in the lives of all Christian men when they are called to protect and establish the true homes of the world, and at such a time they must be willing to go out of their own homes.

Every true home also owes a duty to the Church. We have spoken of the fact that many homes depend unreasonably for the religious training of their children upon what the Church can give them. It is also true that many church members and Christian families make no proper preparation for what the Church has to give. The preacher has been preparing during the week his message for his people. If he is a faithful man and loves his people, he has been preparing a feast for them. He is eager to fill their hearts and minds with the good things of God. He rises and looks at his people with this feast prepared for them, conscious that he is handicapped at the very start by the fact that the majority of his congregation have come into the church after an hour or two spent with a daily paper and with the news of the world, which is not distinctively religious or spiritual. What can the best spiritual provision do for these people?

Preparation Necessary

There are certain things that never come unless we get ready for them. Spiritual life is one of them. The best sermons, the most inspiring messages the pulpit can prepare, are robbed of one-half their power because they fall on stony ground. It is not enough to have good seed. There must be preparation of the soil. The very truth of God is powerless when it falls on the rock. The soil of a man's spiritual life, if tramped down hard by constant money-making, by constant thinking of the things of the world, by constant iteration of the physical, cannot receive the things of God. We would say the farmer was a fool who did not plow his land, who did not open up the soil so the air and moisture could get to it, before putting in his crop. We understand the law of nature in regard to the harvest. It is the same law in the spiritual world, and the homes of the Church have a duty towards the Church which many of them always neglect.

We wonder why the spiritual life of the Church seems so dead; we wonder why the preacher does not preach better sermons; we wonder why we do not grow in grace, and then we neglect the very influence which would make us grow. We say, and with right, that the theatre makes money six days in the week and that is enough. Have we not also a right to say that the press has six days in the week to interest mankind? Why should they begrudge the preacher his one small opportunity before minds which are filled with spiritual receptiveness, with spiritual hunger? I do not believe the Church can ever give to the home what it needs in the way of supplementary religious training until, first of all, there is in the home the spirit of preparation.

Parental Responsibility

Every Sunday School teacher understands how difficult it is to give to children who have come out of homes where there is no teaching of the plainest religious truths, where there has been no teaching of reverence or of obedience to law, where there has been no teaching in regard to courtesy, or thoughtfulness, or gratitude. What can a Sunday School do in one-half or three-quarters of an hour? But where the soil has been prepared beforehand, as it should be, then the seed sown in the Sunday School falls into good, rich soil. The Church cannot do it all. It cannot do even half. The home is the first duty, and its duty towards the Church in the way of preparation for spiritual life is plain and imperative.

The privileges and duties of the home are blended together. They cannot be rightly separated. The privilege of making the home attractive, of making it sacred with religious thanksgiving, of centring the joy of life around its evening gathering, are all blended with the duties which the home owes to the neighborhood, to the State, and to the Church. When these privileges and duties are fully understood and acted upon by the families, world civilization will receive a vast impulse forward. The Church itself is powerless, to a great degree, in the face of the ignorance and neglect of these small duties and privileges—a neglect which, after two thousand years of Christian training, seems criminal in its enormous proportions.

If we have any right to expect the Church to do its proper work in the world, if we have any right to expect the Sunday School to be a factor in the development of child life, we have a right first of all to demand that the family understand its first obligation in the matter of training and preparation. Fathers and mothers who bring children into the world are responsible, first of all, before the Church and the Sunday School, for their training; and God will hold them to account, first of all, for the way in which they have met their responsibilities.

NEW YORK'S ANTI-RENT WAR

It is seldom that we have organized revolt in this country against high rent. We usually think of the Emerald Isle and "absentee landlords" when anti-rent agitation is spoken of, and of the mental picture that is called up in answer to the question "Do those who love the shamrock love to pay rent?" On New York's East Side, however, during the last few weeks, there has been an anti-rent war, or rather an anti-high-rent war, in progress that has kept the teeming population of that overcrowded part of the city in a state of great excitement.

Until the last few months there has been no opposition to the rents charged, though for the accommodations furnished they were exceedingly high. Indeed, it was a common saying that if you wanted to make much money from real estate you should own a tenement house down in the Hester or Grand Street Districts. Further uptown the cost of repairs and the taxes for betterments eat too much into the owner's profits.

The city tax budget has reached a very high figure, and the valuation has been raised on real estate all over the city. The landlords raised rents to cover the increase. Not only was this done in many places but much more. For instance, a ten-dollar rent was raised to fourteen, a fifteen-dollar rent was raised to twenty, and so on proportionally to the rents asked for the better places. Instantly the owners found that they had stirred up a hornet's nest. Meetings were held, committees organized and relief funds started to help ejected tenants. To use its own language "the East Side had struck." The landlords served notices on several thousand tenants who refused to pay the increase to leave their tenements. Then the struggle was on in earnest. Open-air meetings attended by thousands were held in the squares of the East Side. No rioting occurred, but the fiery speeches delivered from newsstands and drays brought the people to a high pitch of excitement. It is of course unlawful for meetings to be held without a permit from the Mayor or from police headquarters, and the meetings were broken up by the police. Many meetings were then held in halls, attended by very excited auditors and still more excited speakers. Only two of the speeches reported were in English, most of them being delivered in some foreign tongue. The majority were in Yiddish, which is the principal language of the East Side.

One young fellow of twelve years, who came from Russia when he was ten, organized the people of his tenement in the Hester Street district for united opposition. He called a meeting, and as there was no room in the house large enough to hold the "Committee of the Whole," they all adjourned to the roof. There the youngster delivered an impassioned speech that sounded to one who did not understand Yiddish like the sharp rattle of the sending instrument in a wireless telegraph station. Nevertheless, it seemed to serve the orator's purpose admirably, and his auditors cheered and yelled as they grew more excited until they could be heard over a city block.

usually fiery sentence from the boy orator brought a roar of applause from above that gave a clue to the searching bluecoats. Cautiously they made their way to the roof, and, sticking their heads through the trapdoor, discovered the meeting in full swing. A cold, damp cloud seemed to drop slowly down on the assembly. The oratory stopped in the midst of a Russian word of ten syllables, and the enthusiasm of the audience subsided with a gurgle. The police then held a conference. "Could they arrest anybody?" they asked one another. The meeting was surely "open air," but the question was, "Would the judge hold anybody for conducting or participating in a meeting held five stories up?" The policemen finally decided that they would let the matter rest, and after ordering these modern cliff-dwellers to retire to their respective flats, the officers again made their way to the street.

One woman, who has a large family, and felt the increase in rent was beyond what she could possibly pay, earned the name of the "East Side Joan of Arc" by her spirited opposition. She organized her own tenement and made speeches in her own and other houses. She also attended the public meetings and "stated her side of the case."

The anti-rent agitation spread rapidly from the East Side to other parts of the Boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx. Requests were sent to the East Side, which has had more experience in matters of this kind, for organizers to come and hold meetings and tell them what they could do. The East Side responded at once and meetings were held, lawyers hired, and the people told what methods they ought to pursue during the crisis.

Smaller meetings, however, were held in the "anti-rent" districts throughout the city, at which resolutions were adopted and sent to the city officials and some of the property owners.

At last reports the excitement was subsiding, and many of the landlords have agreed to a certain amount of reduction in rents. Of course, the old level in charges will not be reached, as the new tenement house laws demanding changes in plumbing and in the arrangement of passages, stairways, windows and courts, have involved much expense. While in the end such changes will be to the advantage of both landlord and tenant, they have been welcomed by neither.

The former dislikes to pay out much money to fix up old buildings, and the tenants in the poorer quarters do not see the necessity for open plumbing or other modern arrangements. The changes, however, are absolutely necessary for the health and well-being of the community.

Now, as the police had sternly forbidden any more open-air meetings, they began to sleuth around to discover where this one was in progress. They would march off in pairs, circle the block and come blankly face to face with other policemen who were taking part in the search. It really seemed to be an open-air meeting, up in the air somewhere, in fact. At last an un-other parts of the Boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx. Requests were sent to the East Side, which has had more experience in matters of this kind, for organizers to come and hold meetings and tell them what they could do. The East Side responded at once and meetings were held, lawyers hired, and the people told what methods they ought to pursue during the crisis.

The Antiquity of Man

CLAIMS made from time to time by ethnologists and geologists, that man has existed on this continent for an immense period of time, have been fairly met in a statement made to the New York Herald by Dr. Ales Hrdlica of the United States National Museum. The learned professor confines himself to the negative side of the question, and is thus in a position to accept or reject any future claims that may be made. He contents himself with declaring that the human remains that have been found up to this time do not justify the claims for great antiquity. He mentions fourteen sets of human bones that have been found in various parts of the United States, Canada and Mexico. Examining each separately, he contends that in no instance do they warrant the opinion advanced that they are of any such age as 56,000 years. It may be that fossil remains will yet be found, and that they may prove that there were prehistoric men in America, but Dr. Hrdlica is convinced that not one of the fourteen skeletons and parts of skeletons hitherto found furnishes proof of the fact.

It is interesting, in reading Dr. Hrdlica's analysis, to observe how little evidence satisfies scientists in questions which appear to contradict the Scriptures. He shows that they frequently utter the most positive statements on extremely slight evidence. In one instance, a learned professor reached the conclusion that man had lived on this continent 250,000 years ago, and Dr. Hrdlica shows that there was little or no basis for any such opinion. He points out that even the bones found in the lower levels do not absolutely prove great age, for on examining them closely he found the marks of teeth upon them, indicating that some burrowing animals had carried them through their tunnels to deeper levels than those in which they were originally buried. The last word on this interesting subject has not yet been spoken, but we have reached a clear line of demarcation. This eminent student declares positively that the case of the opponents of revelation has not yet been proved.

It is by no means clear that the accuracy of the record in Genesis would be disproved, even if bones of undoubted antiquity were found. As Paul states, the natural precedes the spiritual, and the Christian need not be alarmed if he learns that the principle applied in creation and that there, too, the natural preceded the spiritual by a long period of time. Of one thing we may be assured: the Word of God stands firm, and the reasoning or speculation of science can never disturb it.

Good and Bad Books

IT is to the credit of our authors and publishers that few—indeed very few—of the books that come under the ban of critical reprobation, on account of their evil influence on the mind of the average reader, are of American production. Our fiction, for the most part, is clean and wholesome. Whatever foreign critics may say of our literary standards, they have never been able to lay against us the charge of a partiality for the eroticism or the intense realism which passes current as good work in some other countries. Zola, Daudet, Maupassant, D'Annunzio and others of that class have no rivals among American writers. If there were, we cannot believe they would succeed here.

How our critical reading public regard books that belong to the doubtful class has been very pointedly illustrated lately in the case of a talented authoress, who came here from Europe recently on her first visit to America. She had written a book, the notoriety of which preceded her here. It was so decidedly objectionable, in a moral sense, that no sooner had it begun to circulate than the attention of the Post Office authorities was directed to its character, with a view to stopping its passage through the mails. In New England it was taken off the booksellers' shelves, and it was also stopped in the Post Office, Boston taking the lead in the movement for the protection of public morality. Judge Wentworth, of that city, holding that the book "tended to corrupt the morals of youth."

Talent that can paint vice in beautiful colors, and gild sin to make it attractive; that can philosophize so deftly that wrong appears as right; that can clothe wickedness with the garments of virtue and make ignoble acts and thoughts seem noble and praiseworthy, is a dangerous endowment. Zola in his maturer years bitterly regretted the production of his earlier works, which won him a doubtful fame, and he strove hard to atone for their salaciousness by the purity of his later work. Tolstoi, too, is said to have experienced poignant reminders of the evil influence some of his books exerted on the minds of his Russian readers—an influence which all of his later and better work could not efface.

An evil book has brought sorrow into many a home and helped to blight many a young and promising career. Our authorities, our publishers and our librarians do well to be vigilant in their efforts to shut the door of publicity to all books of the class that convey a taint, or that are likely to implant the seeds of moral poison in the minds of the reading public, and which are especially dangerous to the young and inexperienced.

New York's Rent Strike

IN the remarkable rent strike which is now agitating the over-crowded East Side of New York, the thoughtful observer can discover a new and startling aspect of the many-sided immigration problem. Russian Hebrews, Italians, Poles, Hungarians, Greeks, and new-comers of other nationalities have poured into the East Side in an ever-increasing stream for years past, until it has become a vast foreign city in the heart of our greatest municipality. Its laws, customs, language, and interests are all alien to its American surroundings. These immigrants, instead of being distributed throughout the country, where they might be assimilated, have remained where they first arrived. As a result, we have the spectacle of a very large section of our beautiful metropolis so congested by hundreds of thousands of the poorer classes from almost every land under the sun, that it would be impossible to find its parallel anywhere. In density of population, in its confusion of many languages, its picturesque variety of dress and its omnipresent squalor and poverty, our great East Side Babel stands alone.

Poor, but industrious and thrifty, these foreign swarms have crowded the tenements and made them a rich source of revenue to the owners. Many of these homes of poverty are owned or leased by foreigners who, coming here as immigrants, have saved enough by rigid economy to set up as landlords themselves. It is this latter class whom the tenants regard as their worst oppressors. Higher valuations, increased taxes and other burdens have led to a rise in rents, which the tenants declare is exorbitant, being more than sufficient to recoup the landlord not once but many times for his increased outlay. Besides, the season is an especially hard one on the working people, on account of the shutting down or shortening of working hours in factories and sweat-shops—a result of the general trade depression. More than 75,000 men on the East Side are idle this winter, to say nothing of thousands of women and children who usually do their work at home. Life has been reduced to a fierce struggle for bread in thousands of these tenement homes.

Some six hundred owners and lessees are pecuniarily affected by the movement just begun by the newly organized Tenants' League for a general reduction of from ten to twenty per cent. in rents throughout the East Side tenement section. Many tenants have "struck," refusing to pay further rent until concessions are made by the landlords. Meanwhile, although the East Side Babel is in turmoil, the authorities succeed in suppressing any demonstrations that might tend to violence or serious disaster.

While public sympathy leans to the side of the tenants, many of whom are in dire poverty through lack of employment, the general situation is one which cannot be permanently improved until the present congestion is materially relieved. Just how this is to be accomplished is a matter for our legislators to decide.

The Race-Track Gamblers

AN instructive spectacle for moralists is the sudden and courageous attack on the race-track gamblers by the Governor of the State of New York. In a message to the Legislature at Albany, Governor Hughes, after calling attention to the evils and demoralizing influences of this particular form of gambling, observes that although the Constitution imposes upon the Legislature the duty of enacting laws to prevent pool-selling, bookmaking and other forms of gambling, the laws as now enforced do not accomplish this purpose. As a result, the "economic waste," which the Constitution aimed to prevent, is really stimulated and increased. He declares that the present discrimination in penalties is altogether wrong and opposed to public sentiment, and that it has brought the law into contempt. He recommends the Legislature to carry out the anti-gambling laws in letter and spirit, and that hereafter pool-sellers and bookmakers at the tracks, on conviction, should be punished by imprisonment, as the Penal Code provides, without the alternative of a fine.

Although he is fortified both by the Constitution and the logic of the case, the Governor is already realizing that he struck a hornets' nest when he delivered his sturdy blow at the gamblers in the interest of public morals. Sporting organizations, agricultural fair societies and racing associations all over the State are preparing to fight this new interpretation of the law, which would rob them of their present profits from the race tracks. The State now receives a percentage of gate receipts from all race tracks, aggregating about $200,000 a year. This item, however, the Governor decides to be of no consequence in view of the greater question of the public good. So there is a bitter fight in prospect, in which the entire gambling fraternity will combine with other allied elements for the preservation of their ancient right, hitherto unquestioned, to fleece the unwary and prey upon the simple. They have till now been impregnablely entrenched behind the bulwarks of wealth and political influence. But Governor Hughes evidently believes that if gambling is wrong at all, it is wrong everywhere; just as absolutely wrong inside of the race track fences as in the pool room or on the public thoroughfare. He sees how it is ruining thousands every year, and he is perfectly cognizant of the fact, which is made plain in our criminal courts, that a large proportion of the sins of dishonesty are traceable to track gambling.

It is a hard battle, and the issue may be doubtful; but every lover of law, honesty and public decency, will wish the Governor success in the fight.

A Druse Welcome

We are indebted to the Rev. O. E. Moffet of Streator, Ill., for the very striking illustration on the cover of this number. During his travels in the East, he sojournd for a time among the Druses of Lebanon and Carmel, and he has told much about the strange customs and peculiar laws of these people, in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. They are very hospitable to strangers, and the friendly, if inquisitive attitude of the group in the doorway shows that their ancient reticence and indisposition to mingle with the rest of the world are dying out.

Sweden's New King

NOT altogether new to the business of kingship, Gustav V. succeeds his father, the late illustrious King Oscar, as ruler of Sweden. He is nearly fifty years old, and has on several occasions served as Regent during his father's illnesses. He is already a grandfather, his eldest son, who married a niece of King Edward of England, being the father of an infant son nearly a year old. King Gustav is said to be, like his late father, a scholar of distinction, a man of energy and determination, and some military skill. His declaration at the time of taking the oath and his adoption of the motto, "With the people for the fatherland," appear to indicate democratic sympathies. It is doubtful, however, whether he is so genial as his father was, or has so thoroughly the personal regard of his people. He has succeeded in overcoming a prejudice that was formed against him as Crown Prince, and there is now a general feeling among the people that the obstinacy which was said to characterize him is due to his having thoroughly studied a question in all its phases before he made up his mind. He is now regarded as a painstaking ruler, who will spare no effort to arrive at a right decision, and having done so, will carry it out regardless of influence or selfish considerations. The agitation now going on for reform in the representation to insure a more direct control over both houses of the Parliament will test his skill and his administrative capacity. His wife, the Princess of Baden, unites in her person the claims of the house of Vasa, whom the Bernadottes superseded, so that their son is a descendant of both the royal houses. King Gustav's career will be watched with interest and with the good will that his father won from the statesmen and peoples of Europe.

Give the king thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness unto the king's son. (Ps. 72: 1.)

Adopted by a Princess

A startling change in the lot of a child has occurred in the little English village of Addlestone, in Surrey. There is a home for young girl waifs there, which was established, and in part supported by the late Princess Mary of Teck. She took a deep interest in the institution, which is continued by her daughter, who is now married to the next heir to the throne. During one of the visits that lady paid to the home several years ago, she noticed a bright little girl whose name was Alice Steel. She left the child in the home, but inquired about her on her visits, and during her absences in India and elsewhere requested the matron to mention little Alice specifically in her periodical reports. It is presumed that she behaved well, and justified the interest taken in her, for the Princess has now given a signal proof of her favor. On Christmas day a letter arrived bearing the royal arms, directing Alice's removal to a good school, and stating that she might consider herself regularly adopted by the Princess of Wales. Many girls will doubtless envy little Alice the distinction of being the adopted daughter of a princess, but an infinitely higher distinction is open to them which will extend beyond this life into eternity.

I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty. (II. Cor. 6: 17, 18.)

To Cure Spinal Meningitis

Hopes of finding a remedy for this dread disease are encouraged by the interview Dr. Simon Flexner recently gave to a reporter of the New York Times. Dr. Flexner is the director of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, and has been for more than a year striving to perfect his serum. It is stated that of the few cases in which he has already used the serum, three out of four have recovered. He was delighted with its results in isolated cases, but not until there was an epidemic of the disease, when thousands of the cases could be treated with the serum, would he feel justified in speaking positively. Dr. Flexner spoke hopefully also of the experiments in substitution now being made, which he said promised to revolutionize surgery. Already it had been proved possible to transplant arteries, and perhaps the time might come when the vital organs, even the heart itself, might be transferred from an animal to a suffering patient. The doctor is perhaps somewhat too sanguine. The vital organs cannot so easily be removed and replaced as he appears to think. Even the heart as the symbol of the affections and desires, can be changed only by the intervention of divine power.

I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh. (Ezek. 36: 26.)

Activity of Germs

The remarkable death of Mr. J. H. Bernard, I.C.S., a Government Commissioner in India, who was a trustee of a mission church in Calcutta, is reported in a recent issue of the Bombay Guardian. A sad feature of the case is that his wife and her sister also lost their lives at the same time. The two ladies were suddenly taken ill, and the local doctor perceived that they were suffering from a severe form of cholera. He did what was possible to relieve their agony, and was leaving their apartments, when a servant called him to attend the Commissioner, who was ill with the same symptoms. In a short time all three had succumbed to the malignant disease. The government inquiry revealed a strange cause for the calamity. Two days before the deaths, during the absence of the family at church, where the Commissioner read the service, the household servants, contrary to orders, washed a number of cloths or towels in the river. It happened that the body of a man who had died of cholera had been laid on the river bank, ready for removal to the burning ghat. It was near the place where the body lay that the linen was washed. The sanitary inspector was positive in attributing the deaths to this cause. It seems impossible to make the ordinary native of India perceive the necessity of sanitary precautions and his indifference unhappily often imperils other lives beside his own. He regards calamity, when it comes, as a sign of the divine anger, not as the consequence of his own imprudence. Men everywhere are slow to learn that their own carelessness brings disaster on themselves and others.

A Thief Self-trapped

Detectives in New York had no difficulty in fixing the guilt of a burglary which was perpetrated a few evenings ago. A butcher on Second Avenue closed his store with his usual care and went to his home a few blocks away. Late that evening, having occasion to pay a visit to friends, he made a short detour on his return, that he might pass his store and assure himself that everything was safe. To his astonishment he saw that a pane of glass had been cut from the front door, and looking in he saw two men moving about in the rear of the store. He called up the police on the telephone and remained on guard till they came. They soon found a man crouching behind some barrels, but they could not find the other, though the butcher was sure he saw two men. Finally, having thoroughly searched the store, they thought of looking in the refrigerating room. There they found the burglar insensible. The room is lined with metal and the door closes tightly with a spring latch, which cannot be opened from the inside. The burglar was immediately taken to the hospital, where there is hope of saving his life. Had he been in his refuge much longer, he would have died there. He had better have stayed in the open and been taken, than try to escape in such a way. He put his life in peril in trying to save his liberty. That we count folly, but, as God warns us, the wicked man is a fool and his refuges vain.

He is cast into a net by his own feet, and he walketh upon a snare. (Job 18: 8.)

An Inspector's Complaint

An immigration inspector tells a doleful story of his experience on Christmas Day. He had been assigned to the care of the immigrants on the steamship Florida, which arrived at New York from Mediterranean ports too late for admission on Christmas Eve. He spent the day on board, and though surrounded by over a thousand persons, he declares it was the most lonely and doleful Christmas he ever spent. He could not understand a word spoken either by crew or passengers. The crew talked French and the immigrants Italian. He longed for a greeting in his own tongue, but there was not one who could utter it. In sheer desperation, he began to whistle "The Star-Spangled Banner," but it appeared to be regarded as a challenge, and was quickly drowned by the Mar-seillaise and the national Italian airs. As soon as his watch was relieved, he rushed into a saloon, but the waiters were German and jeered his English order. In a neighboring cigar store he was greeted by some gibberish he could not identify. It was only when he got away from the water side, within sight of Broadway, that he heard the familiar sounds. He declares that the day was spent as completely in exile as if he had been in the Fijian Islands. His experience is suggestive. It indicates that it is the society a man is in, rather than the place, that determines his enjoyment. People sometimes forget this in thinking of the life beyond the grave. They cherish the hope of going to heaven when they die, though they are alien to the spirit and principles of those who compose the kingdom of God. Men released from the body at death inevitably go as the disciples did when released from custody.

Being let go, they went to their own company. (Acts 4: 23.)

of a mission church in Calcutta, is reported in a recent issue of the Bombay Guardian. A sad feature of the case is that his wife and her sister also lost their lives at the same time. The two ladies were suddenly taken ill, and the local doctor perceived that they were suffering from a severe form of cholera. INDIA'S DARK FAMINE OUTLOOK

PUBLIC recognition has been given by the government in India to the serious conditions indicated by the crop reports. While there is as yet no actual famine, it is evident that famine must come with the early part of the year, because the winter crops failed. They depend on the rains of the monsoon, which were sparse in many districts and wholly failed in others. The government therefore sent out a commissioner to investigate the facts and report. He made a tour of the districts involved, which have a population of nearly a hundred million persons, and said that while the conditions were not so ominous as in 1900, the year of the great famine, they were so serious as to give cause for alarm. It was evident that there would be widespread distress. Prompt measures have been taken to extend funds for agricultural loans and for improvements so as to provide work for those in need, and a general remission of revenue collections has been ordered. Urgent requests have also been sent to native rulers to maintain present prices for food and to prevent the merchants in their districts precipitating distress by hoarding food or by raising prices. Arrangements have also been made for the relief of people who are unable to labor on the government relief stations. In Bombay, Gujerat and the Deccan there is certain to be distress, and relief measures will be needed in Rajputana and the Central States. Madras happily will be relieved to some extent by rains which though belated have been copious. Sir John Hewett, Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces, said that the staple food crops of the poorer classes in his district, which covers seven million acres, would be little more than a quarter of the normal yield. Nevertheless, the people were meeting the situation with patience, courage and fortitude, worthy of all admiration. He considered the general arrangements for relief were well up to date.

One of the most hopeful signs of governmental activity is a movement that has been commenced in Upper Burma for river improvements, to which the government has contributed about four million dollars. If such a principle was adopted through India, the dread of these recurrent famines would to a large extent be obviated. Gen. Cotton demonstrated ten years ago that the construction of irrigation works would pay, and that there was more water running to the sea in absolute waste than would suffice to render large sections of India independent of the monsoon. He actually proved by the experiment of the Godavery Irrigation Works, which cost four million dollars, that the returns had yielded a profit on the outlay.

We can only hope that the confidence of the government in the adequacy of the measures it is taking to meet the crisis will be justified. In the meantime, missionaries are earnestly pleading for help.

The Rev. J. C. Lawson, of Pilibhit, U. P., writes:

Another severe famine threatens North India. It is the common theme of conversation among both foreigners and natives. As time goes by, the situation becomes worse and worse. Many have but one meal a day and that generally a very meagre one.

Rev. Henry Forman, of Jhansi, writes:

We are face to face with a famine which will probably be as severe, perhaps even more severe, than that of 1896-97. Our mission (North India Mission of the American Presbyterian Church), at its recent annual meeting, adopted a resolution asking for help in the saving of life and expressing gratitude for past help received from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the support of orphans. For all the sympathy and aid given us by Dr. Klopsch and the readers of his journal we are profoundly grateful. All the stations of our mission—Allahabad, Fatehpur, Cawnpore, Jhansi, Gwalior, Etawah, Etah, Fatehgarh—are in the famine territory.

Bishops Frank W. Warne and J. E. Robinson, missionary bishops of the M. E. Church, write from Lucknow:

The complete failure of the crops over such a large area makes acute famine sure for at least six months and probably for an entire year. The stricken area includes the united provinces of Agra and Oudh, almost in their entirety, most of Rajputana, large parts of Panjab, most of the central provinces and a slice of the west of Behar, with a probability of scarcity also in the north end of Gujerat. This territory includes almost, if not quite, one hundred million people, millions of whom must have help.

The government of India has already advanced several million rupees to landowners and in various parts is opening relief works and can be depended upon to do all that is possible, but unless its efforts are supplemented, all it can do will fall short and the result will be calamitous to great numbers. . . . There are fully 150,000 Christian converts in the affected region, who in a special way will suffer unless the missionaries can help them.

In the leading newspapers of India, the famine is already an absorbing topic. The Pioneer, in a recent issue, says that in view of the scarcity and the increased prices of food, the time has come for the government to grant compensation allowances to low-priced government servants. Another paper, the Panjabee, says:

The grim spectre of famine looms ahead and threatens to stalk the entire country, already overwhelmed by a sea of troubles. There is no question that a scarcity is imminent, perhaps one of the severest in the decade which has already been marked by two dire visitations. The alarming rise of prices of all food articles left little room for doubt as to what was to follow, and now all doubt is set at rest by the publication of the government forecast.

Natives of India Digging a Well

Six thousand people are now employed on test works in five districts of the United Provinces, and 1,200 people in two of the Central India States. Test works will be opened shortly in parts of Bombay and the Central Provinces.

THE "STEAMED LADY"

THE STORY OF A VICTIM OF FASHION AND FOLLY

By KATE UPSON CLARK

TWO lively young women have just returned from their third trip to Europe. It has been three years since they went before, and their impression of the changes which have taken place within that time are interesting and valuable. They report that traveling is constantly growing easier, and hotels better all over the Continent—the testimony of most of last summer's tourists.

"But how much more the women at the hotels dress than they used to!" said one of the travelers. "When we were there before one did not feel conspicuous to go to the table d'hôte in a traveling gown. Now, everybody has to wear a dinner-dress. Many of the ladies are decollete. And the powder! It is simply applied by handfuls. No attempt is made to conceal it—and surely, that is much the easiest way to do. The faces of several of the ladies were actually fuzzy with powder, so that if they moved their heads quickly it fell off in a little white shower.

"When you consider that many foreign ladies paint their lips a bright scarlet and their eyebrows black," she added, "you can imagine that they look like harlequins. They do not rouge nowadays. Their cheeks and their foreheads are just the same color. But you should have seen the 'Steamed Lady.' She was the most extraordinary spectacle that we encountered during the whole five months."

"The Steamed Lady?" I interjected.

"Yes. She was, of course, a very rich person, and, fortunately, she had never had any children. As she is nearing sixty, she is naturally becoming wrinkled, which her vanity could not bear. Her husband is as vain of her as she is of herself, and he was as anxious as she was, people said, to have her wrinkles removed. She was told that if she would submit to a thorough steaming process, her face would become like a baby's. She would have to endure great pain. She would be separated from her friends for at least six weeks; but after beginning it, she must go through to the bitter end, or else she would look worse than ever. It was going to cost a small fortune; but she said she didn't care how much it hurt, nor how much it cost. She was willing to bear anything if she could only get rid of those wrinkles. They say that her sufferings were indescribable. For more than six weeks she was confined in her prison, without any light, unable to read or do anything to pass away the hours, and all the time in an inconceivable temperature. But she bore it heroically. At last she was slowly introduced again to the light of day. It was a fortnight or more, they said, before she could stay in the sunshine all day, and still longer before she could be permitted to sew or read, but the wrinkles had truly disappeared.

"Well, she had been out for two or three months when we came to the hotel, and her face was as smooth and fair as a baby's. But instead of being beautiful, she was simply grotesque. People were coming from far and near to gaze upon her, and you couldn't see her without laughing. In spite of her fashionable clothes, and her aping of youth, it was plain that she was an elderly woman. Her real age showed in her eyes, in the way she walked and in a thousand little curves. And then to see that calm, round baby-face upon the old lady!—it was unspeakably funny! But she never realized it at all, people said. She was apparently enchanted with the success of the operation, and thought she was looking perfectly lovely. But there will be one good result from her ridiculous appearance. Nobody who sees her will ever want to be 'steamed.'"

"The face of every woman is a history or a prophecy. Have no sympathy with the woman who tries to efface wrinkles. If she has lived the right life, she will not wish to do it, for there is history in every line." Thus says wise Margaret Sangster, and she is right. A writer recently told a pretty story of a mother who said she

"kept her sons in love with her by being careful not to allow a spot on her face, nor to let her weight increase above a certain figure, nor even to appear in an unbecoming gown before them." Now, this mother doubtless attended also to the higher virtues as well. But would not the sons of such a mother be likely to choose their wives with more regard to the smooth complexion, the slender waist prescribed by fashion, and the well-fitting gown, than from consideration of higher qualities? And which course would be the likelier to procure solid happiness?

A young man who recently graduated at the head of his class from one of the most famous educational institutions in the world, remarked to his most intimate friend among his classmates: "Isn't it queer how we all run after the prettiest girls? I do it—you do it. And yet I have been going over in my mind all of the smartest fellows I know—and every one of them—for I am pretty well acquainted with the families of them all—has a plain-looking mother, but highly intellectual. Now, every sensible fellow looks forward to having a home and family of his own, and we want our children to be the very finest there are. Why don't we cultivate a taste for the cultured girls, even if they are plain?"

"Sometimes they come handsome and smart, too," responded his friend hopefully.

"Yes, said the other, "but they are seldom of the kind who can size up and conquer the hard problems of life—the kind that make the best mothers. As the poet says, when we fall in love with a bewitching mouth, everything it says seems to us wisest, discreetest, best, even though it may be nonsense."

While mere physical beauty will probably continue to attract, until some spiritual X-ray is discovered which will reveal the beautiful soul which is so often hidden behind a plain exterior, the discerning do not have to wait for any such distant day to read a noble life-history in a face upon which time and thought and love have graven their honorable wrinkles.

R. M., Columbus, O. What excavations, if any, are going on in Egypt at the present time and under what societies?

There are seven "concessions," where the scientists are working—one at Gizeh, where Dr. G. A. Reimer is working under American auspices; one at Aboukir, where Dr. Borchardt (German Society), is at work; one each at Sakharah and Dashur, where excavations are made for the Cairo government; one American at Lisht; one at the Temple of Abydos, where the Liverpool University has Dr. John Garstang at work, and one opposite Luxor, where Dr. Naville is working for a Swiss society.

E. R. B., Marion, S. C. How deep and broad will the Panama Canal be when it is finished? How long will it be and what will it cost and when will it be finished?

The first or Colon section is from the Caribbean Sea to the mouth of the Mendi River, where a channel is to be excavated, having a bottom width of 500 feet and a depth of forty-two feet below mean tide. The section from Mendi River to the Gatun locks will have the same dimensions. From Gatun to San Pablo the channel will be 1,000 feet wide and have a depth of forty-five feet. The width then gradually decreases. It runs from Culebra Cut to 1,000 again, then back to 500, etc. It would be impossible to give here all the dimensions. It will probably take eight years at least to build, and the estimated cost is $140,000,000.

J. F., Lowell, Mass. Will you please give me the lineage of Mary, the mother of our Lord?

In Matthew, chap. 1, is found the genealogy of Mary; while Luke, chapter 3, gives the family tree or genealogy of Joseph.

W. M., Wilmington, N. C. Can you tell me why New York is called Gotham and its citizens Gothamites?

It is a humorous colloquial term, which was first applied to New York by Washington Irving, in his Salmagundi Sketches. It ridiculed the pretensions of its people to great wisdom.

Mrs. M. J. W. Where do the people known as Slavs come from?

The Slavic nations number about 80,000,000 and occupy about a third of Europe. Little is known of their history before the sixth century. They may be now divided into the eastern and western families. The eastern comprise the Russians, the Bulgarians, the Serbo-Croats, among whom are included the Servians and Montenegrins. The Slovenes in Styria, Carinthia, also belong to the eastern family. The western family includes the Poles, the Czechs or Bohemians and the Slovaks in Hungary, the Moravians and the Lusatian Wends in Saxony and Prussia. There are other minor divisions. It is thought by some historians that the original home of the Slav was in Volhynia and White Russia.

R. B., Brooklyn, N. Y. When was the famous Astor Library established in New York City?

John Jacob Astor, who died in 1848, left the sum of $400,000 "to establish a library in the city of New York." The building was opened January 9, 1854. It had then about 80,000 volumes. The building has been much added to and the number of books greatly increased.

Reader. The first prayer offered in the American Congress was made by Rev. Dr. Duche (pronounced "Du Shay"), an Episcopal clergyman, who was invited to open the national assemblage in Carpenter's Hall, Philadelphia, with Scripture reading and invocation. Washington, Henry, John Adams, Randolph, Rutledge, Lee, Jay, and all the distinguished leaders were present and united with the audience in the act of reverence. Washington knelt during the prayer and so did many others, while the rest stood with bowed heads, until the final words: "All this we ask in the name and through the merits of Jesus Christ, Thy Son, our Saviour. Amen."

J. V. W., Owosso, Mich. What is the meaning of the name Lusitania of the giant steamship?

Lusitania was the ancient name for the western part of Spain, including modern Portugal. It is now the poetic name for Portugal.

L. B., Oakdale, Calif. 1. Of what house is the present Princess of Wales? 2. What is the cause of Norway and Sweden each having a king?

1. Before her marriage to the Prince of Wales she was Princess Victoria Mary of Pacific waters, where we now hold many island possessions. A third motive, as some believe, is to demonstrate the need of a larger navy, which will be strong enough to protect American interests in both oceans.

We love to hear from our old friends. Mrs. L. W., New York, writes:

I am eighty-seven years old; have taken your paper for more than twenty years without interruption. How many such have you on your list of subscribers?

A considerable number, no doubt. Some of them may feel like supporting our statement by sending us a line. We should like to have a roll-call of those who have read this journal as long as Mrs. L. W.

E. M., Auburn, N. Y., referring to a recent inquiry in THE MAIL-BAG, in regard to the convergence of the meridians and United States surveys, sends this solution of the problem:

1. If the earth were a flat surface, the meridians, being at right angles to the equator, would be mittee of your citizens lay the matter before the district attorney or some local judge, for suitable action.

W. A. W. Is there a sound where there is no ear to hear it?

Scientists have differed greatly on this point. Sound is the impression produced on the ear by the vibrations of air or water in contact with the tympanum. Currents of wind or water, it is said, produce no sound until they are made vibratory by encountering obstacles.

M. O. T., Bourbon, Mo. Were the wise men of the East, as recorded in Matt. 2, and the shepherds, as recorded in Luke 2, the same persons? A difference of opinion in my Sunday School Bible class last Sunday suggests this question.

No. The shepherds were natives of the place; the wise men (Caspar, Melchior and Baltazar, as they are called in the legend), came from afar.

I. B. When did Alexander Selkirk, whose adventures suggested Robinson Crusoe, live?

He was born in Scotland in 1676, and died in 1723.

A reader in Lexington, Ky., Dr. W. H. Forsythe, sends us an instructive account of the temperance situation in that State. It is estimated that the value of the saloons and breweries in Atlanta which went out of business on Jan. 1, is from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000, and in the entire State some $5,000,000. There is no question that the prohibition law will be strictly enforced. Gov. Hoke Smith is quoted as saying that the brewers are preparing to manufacture soft drinks and ice, and that there is plenty of work in the State for all who will go out of the liquor business. He adds further that the State revenues will be ample without the liquor taxes to provide for all appropriations.

Miscellaneous

J. H. P., Amsterdam, N. Y. Secretary Strauss, of the Department of Commerce, is a Hebrew.

Citizen, Carthage. They are rivals in the same field, one being an offshoot of the other.

B. F. Y., Woodstock. There is no such passage in the Bible.

Reader, Canton, Ill. No, except possibly that some may have paid a little more for the newly minted coins as curiosities.

A. S. C., Montague, Mass. The play has been condemned as impious and sacrilegious. In several cities the authorities have officially forbidden its presentation.

Inquirer, New York. The Abigail Free School and Kindergarten has moved to new, commodious and pleasant quarters at 25 Charlton Street, where it occupies two buildings. Average attendance in the various departments has been 360, total attendance during the year 67,016; 35,622 meals have been dispensed. Total cost, $6,325.15. The work is unsectarian. The object is to prepare the children of poor foreigners for the public school and good citizenship. At the end of the year there is a debt balance of $1,310.50. The school is largely supported by voluntary contributions.

A New Year's Greeting

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I take pleasure in enclosing $2, for which I wish to renew my subscription for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and become a subscriber for The American Boy. I have two bright young sons, who enjoy reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I would not be without it for three times its price. I, too, enjoy it as much as they, and consider it one of the finest periodicals in the land. Success to you, the HERALD, and the grand old Bowery Mission.

Relief Workers in the Great Chinese Famine of 1907

THIS is a group of men and women who distinguished themselves by their devoted and self-sacrificing labors on the field during the famine in China a year ago. First on the right of the photograph, sitting, is the Rev. W. C. Longdon, Chairman of the Chinkiang Committee. Immediately back of Mr. Longdon is Mr. Walker, Transportation Agent. The second figure from the middle post to the right is the Rev. Mr. McCrea, Treasurer of the Chinkiang Committee. To his left hand is the Rev. Z. Charles Beals, of the Wuhu Mission. The rest of the group includes the wives and families of the missionaries and their associates and co-workers, with native helpers.

Teck. 2. Norway and Sweden were joined under the same king in 1815. Each had its own parliament, and managed its own internal affairs. Friction between the countries increased during the last few years. Norway asked for separate consular representation abroad, and this finally led to its withdrawing from Sweden, and electing Prince Charles of Denmark as King of Norway. It is impossible to give the whole history here. The history of Sweden in the Stories of the Nations series will be of help to you.

Old Subscriber, Omaha, Neb. I have heard several meanings of the name Connecticut. What is the correct one?

It is from the Indian name Quonectacut; translated, "Long River of Pines."

Mrs. M. D. K., Plymouth, Mass., writes:

Reader, Washington, N. J. Will you kindly advise me through THE MAIL-BAG of the motive of our fleet in taking the long cruise into foreign waters?

There are two motives: 1. A practice cruise, which will bring the fleet up to the maximum in efficiency and prepare it for emergencies. 2. A naval demonstration in parallel to each other, and consequently could not converge. But as the earth is a sphere, the meridians must converge and meet at the poles. 2. The public lands of the United States are first divided into plots, the south side of which is a parallel and the east and west sides of which are true meridians, all these sides being either twenty-four, thirty or thirty-six miles long, but as the meridians converge, the north side is somewhat shorter than the others. These plots are divided into plots, the east, west and south sides of which are six miles long, and the north side of the larger plot being divided into equal parts (approximating six miles), makes the north sides of all these small plots, which are called townships, somewhat short of six miles long. All of the above lines are run with a solar compass that they may be true parallels and true meridians. These townships are then again divided into plots, by chain and compass, of one mile square, called sections, beginning at the east side of the township, but as the north side of the township is not six miles long, the west row of half sections do not hold out full measure, and are sold for what they really measure. The above directions are somewhat varied, according to the location of the land surveyed.

As nine-tenths of the business is secured by means of circulars sent through the mails, would it not be a good idea to bar this class of matter from the mails?

It might be a good plan to gather evidence of any violations of law on these points, and let a regularly organized com-

TEMPLES THAT NEED PURGING

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

JESUS called the great Temple in Jerusalem "My Father's House." Three temples have succeeded each other, built upon the same spot, the crest of Mount Moriah, one of five mountains on which Jerusalem was located. The crown of Mount Moriah was the stone on which, as an altar, Abraham had prepared to offer Isaac. This was afterwards enclosed in the most sacred part of the Temple, "the holy of holies." The first Temple was built by King Solomon, the precious things for its construction having been largely gathered by his father, King David. The Tabernacle which preceded it, though largely made of curtains, was rich in its construction in gold and silver and embroidery. The Temple of Solomon was a small building as we reckon places of worship to-day, only ninety feet long by thirty wide, with a series of courts about it. After standing for four hundred and twenty-four years, it was broken down and destroyed by the King of Babylon, B.C. 598, when the Jews were carried into captivity. In the year B.C. 515, the Temple of Zerubbabel arose where King Solomon's Temple had stood. It had been built by the Jews who returned from captivity by permission of King Cyrus. It was one-third larger than King Solomon's Temple, but was far from being as magnificent, lacking most of all the Shekinah of the Divine Glory which had filled Solomon's Temple at its dedication.

Herod's Temple

After nearly five hundred years more had passed and the second Temple had fallen much into decay, King Herod the Great undertook its restoration. He began the work twenty years before the birth of Christ, but it was not entirely completed until A.D. 64, under Herod Agrippa II., when Christ had come and gone. This was called "Herod's Temple." We are more interested in the details of construction of Herod's Temple than of any of the others, because it was the Temple in which Jesus taught. The Temple area covered a space of about eight hundred feet square. There was an outer wall enclosing the Court of the Gentiles, the only place in which Gentiles who had become proselytes to the Jewish faith were privileged to go. In the midst of this court was the "middle wall of partition," beyond which no Gentile might venture. Next came the Court of the Women, that is, Israelitish women, and then the Court of Israel, where the men of Israel might go. Next came the Court of the Priests, where only the priests could go. These courts arose in terraces one above the other, until at length the Temple proper stood highest of all.

It will be interesting to recall what parts of the Temple were frequented by Jesus. As a babe forty days old, he was brought into the Court of the Women and was met by Simeon at the "inner gate," which opened into the Court of Israel. At twelve years of age, Jesus probably went into the Court of Israel, and afterwards sat upon the steps leading up to that court, where the "doctors" were accustomed to sit and teach the people gathered about.

Jesus in the Temple

Solomon's Porch on the east front of the Temple was the popular gathering place of the people. It was there, in all probability, that Jesus saw the Pharisee and publican praying. It was there that he revealed himself to the cripple whom he had cured at Bethesda. It was there that the Pharisees watched him critically, and found fault with him. It was in the Court of the Women that he commended the poor widow who had cast all her living into the treasury. It was in the Court of the Gentiles that he met the Greeks who wanted to see him. It was in the same court, on the south side, that he found the traders and the money changers, and cleared them out because they had made it a den of thieves. It was in one of the rooms on the south side of the inner court that Jesus was tried before the Sanhedrin. It was in the Castle Antonia, at the northwest corner of the Temple Court, that Pilate delivered him to be crucified. We do not read that Jesus ever went into the Holy Place.

*The International Sunday School Lesson for January 26, 1908. Jesus Cleanses the Temple, John 2:13-22. GOLDEN TEXT: "Holiness becometh thine house, O Lord, forever." Ps. 93:5.

As the Tabernacle of cloth pointed on to the Temple of stone, both of these pointed on to Christ and Christians as temples of flesh and spirit. John says, "The Word was made flesh and tabernacled among us" (John 1:14). And Jesus himself said in this lesson, "Destroy this temple [referring to his body] and in three days I will raise it up" (John 2:19). Paul shows that this Christ temple of flesh and spirit, as well as the previous temples of cloth and stone, all find their fulfilment in the Christian. "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God?" (I. Cor. 3:16, 17; 6:19.) Peter goes a step further and shows that to which all temples thus far mentioned point, is the Church as "a spiritual house" in which individual Christians are "living stones" (I. Pet. 2:5). John carries the whole series of temple types to its consummation when he says of "the Holy City coming down" (that is, the Christian city on earth that is to be), "I saw no temple therein, for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it" (Rev. 21:

the Old Testament and recall those great chapters in which brave prophets and faithful kings cleansed the Temple—sometimes the Holy Land—of idolatry and other profanations. The two most notable cases are those of Hezekiah (II. Kings 18:4ff.), and Josiah (II. Chron. 34:1-7). A fine example for listless young men who care little what goes wrong in church or State if they can have "bread and games," is the picture of Hezekiah, the young man of twenty-five, every inch a king, superintending his soldiers and servants as they cut down the altars and pillars and groves devoted to the sensual worship of the Syrian Venus, Astarte, and break to pieces the brazen serpent that had been placed in the Temple as a reminder of God's help in the past, but has become an idol. Hezekiah calls it in contempt "a piece of brass," while angry idolaters stood threateningly by, for it is perilous even for a king to meddle with popular superstitions. It would be called "bad politics" to-day. But Hezekiah believed what Washington afterwards wrote as the political creed of all Christian statesmen: "Let us raise a standard

"He drove them all out of the Temple, and the sheep and the oxen"

22); which seems to mean that religion is not to be a fenced-off corner of life, but as directly associated with the board of trade and the city hall and the play ground as it is now with the steepled church. It is all God's world, and therefore temple cleansing to-day means cleansing (1) the heart, (2) the church and (3) the world.

The mission of wind and fire in nature is largely that of purging the world. "Awake, O north wind, and come, thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spices may flow out." The north wind seems rough and cruel, but its benevolent mission is to purify the atmosphere, to drive away the miasmatic fogs. In the threshing floor it is the wind that separates the chaff from the wheat. Especially is it a part of its mission to keep the sea pure by stirring its waters to their depths. Job bethought him of this when he was greatly afflicted: "Am I a sea, that thou settest a watch over me?" (Job 7:12.)

The Mission of Fire

Purging is still more the mission of fire (I. Cor. 3:13). It purifies the gold, it beautifies the silver.

As gold is tried by fire,
So the heart is tried by pain.

It was because the Holy Spirit's mission is first to purge and purify the heart and the Church that it was symbolized by wind and fire at Pentecost (Acts 2; see also Matt. 3:11).

It would be an interesting hunt to those who get as much joy in finding truth as others in killing animals, to range through to which the wise and the honest can repair; the event is in the hand of God."

The Boy Reformer

If Hezekiah is the inspiring example for young men, Josiah is a noble pattern for boys, for he was but sixteen years old when he entered upon the moral street cleaning of Judah and Jerusalem and swept out as interlopers in the Holy Land, the images and altars of a false and corrupting worship. In both instances religious reform was also moral reform. They were both purity crusades. We get a thrilling view of this boy reformer, in righteous wrath personally conducting the purging of his land of popular vices, in the vivid word-pictures of the Bible story: "They brake down the altars of Baal in his presence; and the sun images that were on high above them he hewed down; and the Asherim and the graven images; and the molten images he brake in pieces, and made dust of them, and strewed it upon the graves of them that had sacrificed unto them" (II. Chron. 34:4). The boys and young men of to-day have like opportunities for courageous cleansing, first of their own hearts, then of their clubs and societies and communities. In one great city in America the successful leader of moral reforms for the whole city is the boyish chairman of the Endeavor Citizenship Committee, whose members are sneeringly called "children" by those unfriendly to their cause. Gray-haired pastors are following the lead of this young Josiah of the West, with good hope that the open gambling and Sunday liquor selling and prize fighting that dishonors their city shall be done away.

"And he found in the Temple them that sold oxen." This is not the first case, or the last, that God's Temple has been turned into a stable. "Know ye not that your body is the temple of God? (I. Cor. 6:19.) Nothing that is not holy enough for a Temple should be tolerated in our lives.

When Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, standing at the bar of Trajan, was asked his name, he replied: "My name is Theophorus;" which, says Tophel, signifies "He who carries God; he who gives God an asylum." This is the equivalent of Paul's "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" Hence Tophel also exclaims: "Theophori! That is what we are also, my brethren, Theophori!" Is the reader conscious that he carries God in his heart? If not, let him cry:

Spirit of Love, descend, and let thy fire
With its celestial heat my heart inspire!
Consume all sin, and my soul purify.
That it may be a Temple to the Lord Most High.

"And he made a scourge of cords." Of course, this was only for the cattle. Christ gives no sanction to the whipping-post. In both of his cleansings of the Temple, all he needed to drive out the men who polluted it was that "look" before which, in Gethsemane, the mob fell to the ground. That same soul-searching look beholds every desecration of our heart temples. "Holiness becometh thine house, O Lord, forever" (Ps. 93:5).

Expelling Traders

"And he poured out the changers' money." It was to these bankers that Jesus said that they had made God's house of prayer "a den of thieves," doubtless by such tricks in money changing as now prevail in China, where a variable Mexican dollar and a ten per cent. difference between Shanghai and Hong Kong dollars enable a money changer to play all sorts of tricks on the uninformed traveler. Some who would condemn such tricks in a temple think they are quite in order on the street. But the street is an aisle in the great temple of God's Everywhere. Surely, recent events call teachers as well as preachers in thunder tones to condemn the dishonest financial customs that have to a great degree taken the place of conscience in the commercial life of our land. Every pulpit and Sunday School should discuss faithfully the relation of Christian principles to the commonly accepted commercial code. When millionaire gambling in stocks has nearly upset a nation's prosperity and has seriously hampered every Christian undertaking, no religious teacher can evade his responsibility to deal as faithfully as Jesus did with the great taproot of human wickedness, the covetousness which is idolatry and so wrongs both God and man. Character building is temple building. So the following words of Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler are pertinent:

"Passing a company of workmen engaged in erecting a public edifice, I observed the master-builder with a bit of wood in his hand to which a cord and plummet was attached. He was testing the walls to see if they would stand the law of gravitation. All the superb ornamentation would avail nothing if the wall was not perpendicular. The prophet Amos tells us that he had a vision of God standing upon a wall with

This world did not come into existence by chance, and is not governed by guess-work. God governs it by wise and invariable laws, and to every person, every transaction, every institution, he applies his plumb-line."

In cleansing both the heart and the Church, the two oxen that Christ scourges most severely were Covetousness and Hypocrisy. These were the sins in the heart temples of the Pharisees that Christ lashed with his sevenfold "Woe unto you scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites; who rob widows' houses and for a pretense make long prayers." "Lord, is it I?" we may each of us fitly ask, for absolute sincerity is rare and selfishness is not. It easy to fossilize into formalism. "Lord make me real," should be our frequent prayer.

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

Pleasure at Home

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Rule of the Road

SHORT days now and long nights, snow-drifts deep beside the highway and over the fields, low-hanging clouds and bare branches. This is the reign of winter. Inside, bright fires, warm corners, brisk moving about of mother and the girls to get supper for hungry men, boys running in with red cheeks and mittened hands, reefers buttoned tight around their sturdy bodies, all aglow from a jolly time on the skating-pond. A jingle of sleigh-bells, a cheery wave of the hand from neighbors passing, the lamp shedding its light over bright faces in the long evening, a daughter at the piano, a son with a banjo, apples roasting on the hearth, corn popping on the range, a general atmosphere of coziness, a general expectation of fun, little leisure for reading, much agreeable talk, repetition of household jests, expectation of visits from kindred and friends; all this falls naturally and pleasantly into the routine of winter.

If one has not lately read Snowbound, this is the time to take Whittier from the shelf and see through his clear eyes the interior of a homely New England farmhouse in mid-winter. This is the hour when we may remember Emerson's felicitous phrase, "A tumultuous privacy of storm." Let the tempests rage, let the wild winds blow. The smoke curls up from the chimneys, there is contentment and peace around the home hearth, and more than ever the family draws together, and the bonds of love are strengthened, when the days are short and the nights are long.

All the sweet homes are not in the country. Many of them are in city apartments, rising tier upon tier, replete with every modern convenience, but keeping the same essentials that make ideal the country home—serenity, contentment, repose, warmth and light. If we were asked for a recipe warranted to keep boys and girls happy at home in the winter, I should mix it as follows:

One part loyalty,
Two parts light,
Three parts love.
Well mixed and compounded together.

In a season when retrenchment is necessary, and there must be close counting of every penny on the part of thousands, it is well for the prudent housewife to decide where economy shall be lavish, instead of frugal. Economy ought not to be limited to mere saving of expense. In reality it includes the entire management of a household and of family life. Spend on lamps and candles, or on gas and electricity, and do your saving somewhere else. The boy of eighteen and his mother, a little younger or a little older, hesitate to leave the cheer of a well-lighted home, its air of pleasure and delight, for the engagement that calls them to the outside. Women are often terribly mistaken in fancying that their rich carpets and dainty curtains and costly upholstery enhance the true value of home.

I think of a home with rag carpets and braided rugs, with maps and pictures cut from newspapers in the walls, with splint-bottomed chairs and pine tables, a home in which there was not a single luxury, yet which, through all its years, was a well-spring of pleasure to its inmates, who have gone forth from it to occupy eminent stations and adorn the name they bear. This home had ample provision for pleasure and a background of comfort. It needed no luxury.

In planning for pleasure at home, we should not forget the neighborhood. Little social gatherings of friendly neighbors, who drop in at stated intervals to spend an evening in one another's homes, should be part of each winter's programme. Extending from the home to the church, these social affairs, if genuine and hearty, are almost as useful to the church as the mid-week prayer-meeting. What people need is to get together. The women of the church are, of course, the appropriate leaders in hospitality. A good plan for a Ladies' Aid Society is to divide itself into committees alphabetically, the A's entertaining in one month, the B's in another, and the C's in a third. Or

A LETTER FROM HER SWEETHEART

"May I read it to you, Auntie, the letter from my dear? He's coming home in April. He's been gone a weary year. He's such a splendid fellow—Oh, you needn't smile at me,—Just wait till Jack is home again, and all the world will see." She reads her lover's letter, and the older heart is glad; Who would not breathe a tender prayer for happy lass and lad?

a reception committee may be formed on lines of age, including one evening a trio of grandmothers, on another a quartette of spinsters, again a quintette of young married women, and yet again a bevy of merry girls.

What we want to do is to utilize winter evenings at home and abroad for better understanding of one another, for closer acquaintanceship, even of parents and children, and for bringing into the daily world of work and care a wholesome element of good feeling, and an effervescence of fun.

Taking the year together, my dear,
There isn't more cloud than sun.

WHETHER you are abroad or at home you must obey the rule of the road. In some countries this rule obliges you to keep to the right, in others to the left. People who refuse to adhere to this plain direction get into trouble. The swiftly moving vehicle cannot swerve suddenly out of its course without peril, and two persons approaching each other from opposite points must inevitably collide if they ignore the rule of the road.

On crowded thoroughfares where throngs are passing and repassing all day long there would be continual confusion and needless delays were pedestrians unwilling to keep to the right or the left. The rule of the road is inflexible. One cannot evade it, change it or infringe on it without a result of more or less disaster.

Throughout life we shall find that the same imperious rule must govern our conduct and determine our course of action. We begin our onward march when we are little children, and we never cease our journey over life's road until the end of our earthly days.

Isabella Bird Bishop, a brave English woman whose delight it was to travel in unknown lands, and who cared nothing for danger and hardship when exploring unfamiliar territory, sometimes found herself in pathless defiles of the Rocky Mountains, sometimes in almost abysmal sloughs of despond, stretching from one city of China to another; she ventured on many unbeaten tracks and dared to enter unfriendly neighborhoods, but wherever she went she found that a rule of the road learned by heart in her early childhood, a rule of courage, courtesy and charity, was sufficient to carry her over and through the most difficult places.

The crusty, churlish, impolite person, the person who goes about with a chip on his shoulder, on the lookout for slights, is sure to transgress that rule of the road which tells that we must yield a little when necessary, and on no account take ever so small an advantage of our neighbor. We must, in other words, be courteous. Yet our courtesy must not lead us to concede too much. On the road of life we must not be like Pliable in the Pilgrim's Progress, ready now to agree with one view and then to accept another without regard to principle. The rule of the road, as it affects us in business and in recreation, is a rule of fixed adherence to convictions.

All through life we must keep the balance steady. For example, we may earnestly desire to help by a large contribution a cause that appeals to us. If we can do this by self-denial, affecting no one except ourselves, we are right in laying the goodly sum on the altar. But if part of our income is needed for the support and comfort of an invalid mother, or for assistance in the education of younger brothers and sisters, we should forego the pleasure we might have in helping the world outside, and bend our energies toward doing the duty at home. The rule of the road in our case is to take vigilant care of those in our own company.

A young man had made it his custom from the time when he began to be a wage-earner on every Sunday morning to put aside a part of his weekly salary for the Lord's work. He had other claims, but he set this claim first. One year he said to himself that he would be justified in view of his responsibility in giving nothing as an offering to the Lord. He said later that the experiment had shown him the greatness of his mistake.

NOW, remember, you are my partner to-night," said Glenn. "I don't want you running off to supper with any of the other boys. And you're to be good to Kathleen, you know," he said to Hollis as they went up the steps together.

"I'm here now, and I'll do as I please," she retorted.

"No, you won't, for you have to get home. I'll leave you to spend the night with Amy, sure as fate, if you don't be good," he answered; and with that he ushered her into the scene of festivities.

Thanks to his persistent efforts, Hollis was in a highly nervous state and did "act simply horrid" to every one that evening. Mr. Allan was distinctly delighted when she entered the room, for, in spite of Kathleen's congenial companionship, he had not forgotten Hollis. She had always been exceedingly careful to show only the best side of her character to the minister, and he had believed her to be the very embodiment of all the feminine graces; but on this evening his good opinion was sadly shaken. She was undeniably cross and unlovely; so much so, that she entirely marred the evening's enjoyment.

In response to one of the requests for music, Kathleen and Mabel, Charlie Lester and Mr. Allan sang several college glees which were enthusiastically applauded by the young people. Under the influence of these friends, skilfully aided by Glenn Fraser, the minister threw off his reserve and was, for the first time since coming to Hawthorne, a young man among young people. As a consequence, their friendship was thoroughly won, and the coldness between them utterly destroyed. Hollis saw and resented all this. As the hold of the other young people upon him increased, she felt her own influence slipping away, and it added to her anger. She saw the changed expression in his eyes when he looked at her, and, instead of attributing it to her own erratic words and actions, laid it to the adverse influence of Kathleen Lawrence.

"I'd give a good deal to know what she has been saying to him about me. Something horrid, I am sure. Just wait, Miss Kathleen, till I get him home," she thought.

All in all, the evening was a miserable one for Hollis, and more than once she wished that she had not come. In spite of her promise, she made several attempts to draw Charlie away from Mabel, and to keep Mr. Allan at her side, but watchful Glenn seemed omnipresent, and never failed to interfere with all such violations of their "treaty," as he chose to term it. She went home a sadder, but alas! not a wiser girl, while Glenn rejoiced to think that his little scheme had worked so well, and that Mr. Allan's eyes had been opened to the serious imperfections in her character.

"What could have been the matter with Miss Hayward to-night?" the minister asked Kathleen as they drove back to the Lawrence farm that night. "She did not seem at all like herself. She is usually of such an even, unruffled disposition, but to-night she seemed quite disturbed." The minister was evidently puzzled by the change in his friend, and Kathleen was too good-natured to enlighten him. Charlie and Mabel, riding on the front seat, heard his question and looked at one another and laughed softly.

"That's a mystery to the minister," murmured Charlie. "I'll have to tell that to Glenn."

Then they both listened again. Kathleen was saying: "Something has certainly occurred to trouble or annoy her this evening. I expect Glenn has been tormenting her. He is an inveterate tease. By the way, how did you enjoy his solo this evening? Do you not think that he shows musical talent? I have been trying for a long time to persuade him to cultivate his voice, but I cannot reflecting on any member had been uttered. Kind and charitable in every case had been the opinions given, yet Mr. Allan noticed that there were some of whom little was said. It seemed as if the Lawrence family avoided speaking of those of whose conduct they did not approve. Certainly he had never known people who more consistently adopted the apostle's characterization of charity in thinking no evil, hoping all things and enduring all things. The effect was distinctly beneficial. Mr. Allan returned with a more kindly feeling to every one, and with a resolve to be patient and gentle with any who might show a disposition to cause trouble.

He was more genial, too, and at the first service after his return, he mingled with his people after the benediction, chatting familiarly with them and greet-the Haywards had been most bitter antagonists. She feared that the old Scotchman would persuade Mr. Allan to go with him at once, and so give her no opportunity to prepare the minister for the Alison side of the church difficulties.

"I can count on papa's help," she thought, "for he shares my dislike of the Alisons, and will not like Mr. Allan to fall under their influence. If only this visit can be delayed a week, we can fix it all right."

She was also anxious for an opportunity to dispel the unpleasant impressions which her conduct at the Conover party had probably made upon the minister's mind. She realized that she had recklessly revealed the worst side of her character on that unlucky evening, and that his opinion of her must have suffered in consequence.

No doubt Kathleen took occasion to fill his mind with prejudices and to draw unkind comparisons with herself. Kathleen, she said, judging the girl by herself, would be sure to prejudice the minister against her.

All the time she was jealously watching and listening to the conversation between Mr. Alison and the minister, and was finally much relieved to hear the latter say:

"I shall be glad to avail myself of your invitation in the near future; but this week I must remain at home and do extra studying to make up for last week's vacation. You know I have not been in the ministry long enough to have the traditional barrel of sermons to fall back upon in time of need."

"If vacations are going to make you give us sermons equal to that one you preached to-day, the more of them you take, the better for us," remarked another member heartily.

The minister flushed with pleasure. Such commendation as this was so new as to be delightful. Surely he had misunderstood and misjudged the people of the Hawthorne church.

Standing away to one side, Glenn Fraser watched proceedings with intelligent and mischievous eyes. He noted Hollis' uneasiness and rising anger.

"That girl means mischief," he said to himself. "I am afraid she is plotting some evil. That will be a pity now that things are straightening out. Guess I'll go and smooth down her feathers."

"Hello, Hollis. Have you recovered from the effects of our pleasant excursion? I have felt decidedly exhausted ever since then. It is not often now that I have the privilege of a good old-fashioned wrangle with you, and it has left me 'the waur o' the weer', as our friend Alison would say. How is it with you?"

"Don't be impertinent," she said. "I wonder you are not ashamed to refer to that party after making yourself so disagreeable all the way there."

"But that was according to our treaty," Glenn answered. "When you asked me to take you, I told you I exacted the convince him that it would be worth while. Perhaps if you would speak to him about it he would be persuaded."

In answering these queries in regard to Glenn, Mr. Allan forgot Hollis; and so the unpleasant subject was avoided. Charlie drew a long breath as the conversation drifted safely to a favorable consideration of Glenn's voice.

"Hollis does not deserve that," he remarked softly to Mabel, who answered:

"No. But did you expect any other kind of an answer from Kathleen?"

CHAPTER X

AN UNHEALTHY ATMOSPHERE

THE week's visit at the Lawrence farm had a marked influence on the young minister's mind. He began to see the people of his church in a new light. Yet not a word ing them cordially. The young people gathered around him, conscious that the ice was broken, and that their pastor was one with themselves.

Hollis watched these proceedings uneasily, dismayed by the general good feeling, and especially by the comradeship that appeared to have been established between Mr. Allan, Charlie Lester and the Lawrence sisters. Her dismay was increased when she heard old Mr. Alison say:

"Now, Meester Allan, ye maun come an' bide a week at oor hoose, as ye did at Brither Lawrence's. We maun hae a chance to ken oor meenister, as weel as ither folk do; an' ye'll fin' us ready to mak' you welcome at any time."

This was worse than the Lawrence invitation, so Hollis thought, for in the years of religious strife, the Alisons and privilege of wrangling with you. I was merely a substitute, you know, and you do not expect compliments from a man in that position. You would not have tried me to go if there had been any other escort available. I felt I must pay for filling a gap of that kind, and I took my pay in teasing you. But my journey was certainly lively; you did not complain that I was dull."

"No, but you were spiteful and almost cruel. You put me in a thoroughly bad temper and I have not recovered yet."

"Well, it is all over now. Let us shake hands and be friends."

"No," said Hollis, "I have not forgiven you yet," and she turned away abruptly to speak to a friend.

The harp-strings were still jarring when she reached home, and she was in a mood to drop a little poison into the minister's mind if she could.

The Hayward family gave Mr. Allan a cordial welcome home that made him feel his heart warm toward them. His sincere friends as these were well acquainted having, and although vacations were delightful, "home" still had its charms. His mind was so full of the pleasant time he had experienced and the friendships he had made, and so unsuspecting was he of the family with whom he dwelt, that he did not realize how fully and skilfully they questioned him as to the minute details of his visit at the Lawrence's. All possible church questions that might have been discussed were carefully brought up, to learn what had been put into his mind concerning them. The matter of the choir was of especial interest to Hollis, and he soon obtained an account of the contention which had been held regarding it, and learned of the suggestion for a new leadership which he had made.

"I could have told you that Kathleen would oppose that," Mr. Hayward said. "I am jealous of Hollis, and would rather the choir remained inefficient than be placed under the charge of Hollis. No doubt she had much to say in regard to her own services in this line?"

"No," Mr. Allan answered, vainly trying to recall just what had been said. "So far as I can remember, her words were exceedingly kind about every one. She struck me as being a very amiable, kind-minded girl."

"That is because you do not know her as I do. She is anything but 'amiable and kind-minded' when things do not go her way. One needs to be upon his guard, when talking to Kathleen Lawrence," Hollis remarked as they rose from the dinner table.

The minister went away to his own room, carrying an undefined feeling of sadness and disappointment. The note which had been discordant. The elation and cordiality of the morning had disappeared. He was weary, and heartsick, and blue. He wondered why his mood had changed, and ascribed it to reaction from his week of visiting, not realizing that the true reason was that the dinner-table conversation had affected him unpleasantly. It was on a lower plane than he on which he had been living—a plane in which there was spiritual malarial the product of the swamps in which poisonous weeds of envy and petty jealousy were growing.

During the days that followed, Hollis industriously labored to regain her hold upon the heart of the young minister, an endeavor which had never seemed so desirable as it did now since she imagined that Kathleen Lawrence was making a fair attempt. Like all under-handed schemers, she suspected others of like intrigues and motives, and imagined that things of them which she would have found it impossible to prove. She was all sweetness, and good-humor, and ready, striving to make Mr. Allan forget the unlovely revelations of that evening with the Conovers. The German readings were renewed, and the old arts brought into play; but to her dismay she found that she could not quite regain the place which she had held in his esteem.

Something had come between them, and she could not discover what it was.

On Mr. Allan's part, the old companionship was renewed as eagerly as it was by Hollis. For a little while he told himself that it was as delightful as before; but for some unknown reason, he began to weary of it. The spirit of criticism and of general depreciation was painful to a man anxious to take the best view of every one.

Some way, he could not get the inspiration for his sermons which he had felt the week before, nor was there the same spirit with which to deliver them; hence, his efforts on the following Sunday fell as flat and as unappreciated as those of former weeks.

The people came about him, eager to renew the pleasant conversation of the previous week, but the suspicions engendered through the week were upon him, and were all too apparent in his manner, so that the people turned away disappointed and repelled, and the good feeling that had seemed almost established was dissipated.

Glenn Fraser again watched proceedings with intelligent eyes.

"If something does not happen soon to break that girl's evil influence over the dominion, I'll have to do it myself. He is far and away the best minister Hawthorne has ever had, and he shall not be spoiled or driven away, simply to satisfy Hollis Hayward's notions and ambitions. The Haywards consider me the black sheep of the church—and maybe I am—but their bleaching processes will never make me white. Indeed, I prefer my shade of blackness to theirs."

CHAPTER XI

RELEASED FROM THE SPELL

HOLLIS HAYWARD was in a state of happy excitement. A letter had been received from a friend in the city, announcing her approaching marriage, and requesting Hollis to come and act as one of her bridesmaids. Visions of all sorts of uncommon pleasures in perspective fluttered from that open envelope, and hope remained to cheer her in her delightful days of preparation for a trip which promised so much. Mr. Allan was left very much to himself in these days, for even in the evenings Hollis was occupied with her preparations, and had neither time nor thought for German or anything other than the work in hand.

The minister himself was of little consequence, now that this invitation opened to her the delights and the possibilities of the city; and when, one evening, Charlie Lester came along with his buggy and invited Mr. Allan to go with him to spend the evening at the Lawrence home, she hardly gave any attention to a proceeding which, under ordinary circumstances, would have aroused her anger and dismay. She even forgot to question him the next day about the events of his visit, her mind being entirely occupied with the more important subject of her bridesmaid's dress; so there was nothing to mar his memories of a most delightful evening of congenial companionship, laughter and song. More than that, there were to be new song-books for the Sunday School, and Charlie and the Lawrence girls had agreed to help in the selection, an event to which he looked forward with decided pleasure.

Yes, Ivory Soap is good for shampooing.

A white soap, it yields a perfectly white lather—a lather that cleanses the hair but does not change its color.

Containing no "free" (uncombined) alkali, it can be used without fear that it will dry the hair or make it brittle.

Use the clearest, cleanest water you can get. Soft water is better than hard. Put the Ivory Soap in the water and when a suds is formed, apply it to the hair—again and again and again. Rinse thoroughly.

Towelng will only partially dry the hair. A fan will help. But the best way of all is to give it an air bath—comb it out and let the air and sunshine dry it.

NEW WORDS OF CHRIST

NEWLY found words attributed to Christ have been brought to this country by the art collector, Mr. Charles L. Freer, of Detroit, Mich. They have been translated by Professor Henry A. Sanders, of the University of Michigan, and were reported to the Archaeological Institute at its recent meeting in Chicago. The words were found in an ancient Bible, which was hidden in the sands of Egypt, and apparently dated in the sixth or seventh century of our era. This date places it among the oldest manuscripts in our possession, not indeed so old as the manuscript known as the Vatican, nor as that found by Tischendorf in the monastery of Sinai, which are attributed to the fourth century, but older than any manuscript known at the time the King James version was prepared. It is a mutilated copy of the sacred Word, Genesis to Deuteronomy being missing, and the part containing the Psalms somewhat illegible, either through exposure or through a difference in the ink used. Professor Sanders is working steadily at the translation, which may occupy two or three years.

He naturally examined early in his work such passages as have been the subject of dispute, especially those of the New Testament. Among them was the passage Mark 16: 9-20. It has long been known that the most ancient copies of the Gospel of Mark ended abruptly with the word "for" in the eighth verse. Evidently the original manuscript had been mutilated, or perhaps the last column of the copy, which would be outside in a roll, had worn off by frequent handling. In the next to the oldest manuscripts the twelve verses, as they appear in our authorized version, were added, but there was always a suspicion that they were not from the pen of the Mark who wrote the earlier part of the Gospel. This suspicion proved to be correct, for a few years ago Mr. Frederick C. Conybeare found a very ancient manuscript referring to the close of the Gospel of Mark as "missing." It further went on to state that the missing portion had been supplied by Arisian, "who was himself a disciple of the Lord, and whose words," said the manuscript, "are every whit as good as Mark's words." It may be so, but we would have preferred Mark's words, even though these were written by an authority so eminent as Arisian, who, Papias said, was one of the seventy disciples sent out by Jesus himself. (See Luke 10: 1.)

The new version that Prof. Sanders has just deciphered is not Mark's conclusion, but a variation of Arisian's, or rather an addition to the fourteenth verse. That verse as in our version reads:

Afterward he appeared unto the eleven as they sat at meat and upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them which had seen him after he was risen.

Then these new words appear:

And they answered, saying that this age of unrighteousness and unbelief under the power of Satan, who does not permit the things which are made impure by the [evil] spirits to comprehend the truth of God [and] his power. For this reason, reveal thy righteousness now, they said to Christ; and Christ said to them, The limit of the years of the power of Satan has been fulfilled, but other terrible things are at hand, and I was delivered unto death on behalf of those who sinned in order that they may return to the truth and sin no more, to the end that they inherit the spiritual indestructible glory of righteousness [which] is in heaven.

The manuscript then proceeds with the fifteenth verse, which reads as in our version:

And he said unto them, Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature.

Whether the churches were doubtful about the words having been really spoken we do not know, but they were dropped after some years, as is evident by their not being in our version. They remained for a time, however, for they were in the version that Jerome used in 385 A.D., as we learn from a reference in his works.

Another interesting discovery in this newly found Bible is that the words which the Revisers omitted from the Lord's Prayer, on the ground that they were not contained in the most ancient manuscripts, appear here, and the prayer ends as in the Authorized Version: "For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever, Amen." This shows that the words formed part of the prayer as received in the sixth or seventh century.

An Ornament to the Library

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The book of Animals, Birds and Fishes came to hand all right. The book itself in its make-up is excellent and good enough to enhance any family's library. Its contents I pronounce the complete work of a master hand, making it entertaining as well as instructive.

PAUL DEBLER.

"In God We Trust"

Miss Adelaide H. Reed, of Braidentown, Fla., in the following verses, pictures a nation that has rejected God:

"In God We Trust," the motto old and grand,
Placed on our coins with lowly, reverent hand,
Has grown too old; does not seem up to date—
So say the men who rule affairs of state.
Allegiance is not due to sovereign hand;
Ours is the right to govern our great land.
We trust ourselves, in our own power and pluck;
And if that fails, why, we'll just trust to luck!

Ours is the gold, which now our treasury fills;
Ours are the cattle on a thousand hills;
Ours the proud battleships, that bravely plow
Across the mighty deep, with glistening prow;
Ours the great cities, rushing railway trains.
No thanks to God, who gave to us the brains,
The strength, the will; who gave all things to bend
Our sovereign way to accomplish a great end.

God of our fathers, now by us forgot,
In all our boastfulness, forsake us not;
But in accordance with thy promise true,
Hear the petitions of the humble few,
And, while this cherished motto we resign,
Stamp it upon our hearts and make us thine.

SOME HARD KNOCKS

Woman Gets Rid of "Coffee Heart"

The injurious action of coffee on the heart of many persons is well known by physicians to be caused by caffeine. This is the drug found by chemists in coffee and tea.

A woman suffered a long time with severe heart trouble and finally her doctor told her she must give up coffee, as that was the principal cause of the trouble. She writes:

"My heart was so weak it could not do its work properly. My husband would sometimes have to carry me from the table, and it would seem that I would never breathe again. 'The doctor told me that coffee was causing the weakness of my heart. He said I must stop it, but it seemed I could not give it up until I was down in bed with nervous prostration.

"For eleven weeks I lay there and suffered. Finally husband brought home some Postum and I quit coffee and started new and right. Slowly I got well. Now I do not have any headaches, nor those spells with weak heart. We know it is Postum that helped me. The doctor said the other day, 'I never thought you would be what you are.' I used to weigh 92 pounds and now I weigh 158.

"Postum has done much for me and I would not go back to coffee again for any money, for I believe it would kill me if I kept at it. Postum must be well boiled like the directions on package say, then it has a rich flavor and with cream is fine." Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," found in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Why I Joined the Salvation Army

By MRS. ADJT. E. M. WHITEMORE

Founder and President of the Door of Hope

THROUGH the kindness of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the Door of Hope movement has received considerable prominence. A widespread interest has been awakened in the reclamation of unfortunate girls. From the time of its inception till now, the entire work has been grounded on faith in God. The results have far exceeded our expectation. During seventeen years over sixty-nine branches have sprung up in many cities and towns in the United States and other countries.

In the "Mother Home" (now at Tappan, N. J.) nearly 5,000 young girls have been sheltered, encouraged and led to Christ. Thousands have had similar opportunities in the other Doors of Hope. Within the period named nearly $100,000 have been received in voluntary contributions for the support and work of the Mother Home. Although the Doors of Hope are each independent of the other as to means of support, they are all more or less banded together under the "Door of Hope Union," with but one object in view, namely, that the workers, through interchange of views and prayerful ministrations, may be of mutual assistance and blessing in furthering the entire work for the glory of God.

About three years ago, during a somewhat serious illness, I was anxious because I knew of no one to assume the responsibility of conducting the Door of Hope work in the event of my death. I prayed much over it, asking divine guidance, and was led to communicate with Commander Eva Booth, of the Salvation Army, concerning the matter. After a full consultation, a plan was arranged whereby those specially interested in this movement could work together in harmonious conjunction. The original board was retained, myself as president and treasurer, the work to continue on the same spiritual lines as formerly, and its continuance being provided for in the event of the death of the founder.

Two years have passed since this went into effect. We all steadfastly labored together, and have ample occasion to thank God for great blessings, and for the conversion of many a young girl. Nearly five hundred such cases have already been dealt with. No one can estimate the good that has been accomplished in those lives.

The certainty of the Door of Hope's permanency under the supervision of the Salvation Army urges me, with greater zest than ever, to labor on in behalf of the Mother Home. A noble spirit of self-sacrifice has been shown by the lady officers of the Salvation Army in this whole matter, which appealed to me very strongly. As I was brought into closer touch with their rescue department, I was impressed with the deep sincerity of the efforts made in behalf of suffering humanity. I felt prompted to inquire of the Commander if visitations of cheer and encouragement were made among their officers in the various corps. As she replied in the negative, her expressive eyes glistened with sympathetic appreciation of the suggestion. Such a plan, she declared, was greatly needed, and would be a blessing to some of the hard-working officers, and especially to some of the women officers struggling bravely in small towns, and who required to be encouraged and comforted. This conversation resulted, some months later, in my offering myself to the Commander for such a ministry. No one had even hinted at the possibility of my joining the ranks of the Salvation Army, or entering into any further relationship than that which had already existed in connection with the Door of Hope, and there was a natural hesitancy lest comment should be invited by my taking such a step, and by assuming the uniform after being before the public for years in independent Christian work. But while God's motives cannot as yet be all fathomed in guiding such a step, I feel that it is His will and that I can confidently await His time for further enlightenment.

I received the commission of Adjutant in the Salvation Army. Necessarily, some added responsibilities arose, but everything soon became systematized and the work moved onward rapidly. Already nearly one hundred officers have been visited and their sick prayed with, spiritual communion has been held with others in their homes, and in their respective corps many services were held which have produced fruit for the kingdom.

When in New York, with the exception of the time allotted to the Door of Hope, a portion of each day is spent in my office at Salvation Army Headquarters, in connection with the Woman's Branch of the Anti-Suicide League. It is a unique work, bringing us into contact with many who, almost on the verge of despair, come to us for the main purpose of unburdening their hearts, either after attempting suicide, or when on the verge of dashing themselves into eternity by their own hand.

Entering the Salvation Army as a "special," my freedom is in no wise curtailed regarding accepting invitations to speak as formerly, outside of those arranged by the organization, and many an extra visit has been made to places I might never otherwise have visited.

A lamp-chimney without a name is one that the maker cannot trust.

Why should you trust it?

MACBETH'S Pearl Glass Chimney fits perfectly, can always be trusted to do several things that no hastily made chimney, of common glass, can possibly do. And I put my name on it. It burns all of the oil—does not turn a lot of it into smell. It lets all the light through, because it is perfectly clear. It never breaks from heat.

My Lamp-Chimney Catalogue is full of practical suggestions about lamps and chimneys and wicks and oils, and how to keep them in order. It tells which chimney will give the best light on every kind of lamp. It saves a great deal of bother and money. I gladly mail it, free, to anyone who writes for it. Address

"DEFECTIVE HEARING"

ANTISEPTIC

I was deaf for thirty-five years

My Invisible Antiseptic Ear Drum (which I patented July 3rd, 1906) and my method have restored my hearing. Since I put it on the market last February, it has restored the hearing of hundreds of others, many of whom had given up all hope of ever hearing again. It has also relieved many from distressing head noises. I have just gotten out a new Ear Drum that is a great improvement over my original Drum. The megaphone principle and the flat-sounding membrane make my drum the most successful device on the market. Do not confound this Drum and my method with any failures you may have tried. My Principle is different; my method is also different, and they are the most successful of anything offered for aid to Hearing. It is "Unseen Comfort." My new method and antiseptic Ear Drum are endorsed by leading physicians. Absolutely out of sight when worn. The price is very low. Why not have your hearing restored? Let me write you about it. I do not make absurd and impossible claims. I will give you facts only and will not exaggerate.

An Independent Greek Church in Canada

VERY remarkable religious movement is taking place in the west of Canada. Among the recent immigrants are about two hundred thousand Galicians, most of whom are members of the Greek Church. Many of these have become alienated from the church of their fathers. For this alienation various reasons have combined, as friction between the Russian Greek Church and the Patriarchate of Jerusalem; later, complications arose with the Patriarch of Constantinople.

A few years ago a missionary bishop came to New York to establish an independent church. Canada offering a favorable missionary field, he proceeded to Winnipeg and ordained a number of Greek priests. "Here follows," writes the Rev. J. S. Woodsworth, D.D., "another complicated chapter—dissatisfaction, authority claimed and authority resisted, intrigues, suspicions, and finally open rebellion." A number of the more progressive leaders of this movement, catching the inspiration of the wider liberty of the New World, resolved to establish the "Independent Greek Church of Canada." They applied for counsel and co-operation to leaders of the Presbyterian Church in the West—Principal Patrick of Manitoba College, Dr. Bryce and Dr. C. W. Gordon, better known as "Ralph Connor." These broad-minded and sympathetic men adopted a liberal policy, allowing the Galicians to establish a church of their own, with much of the Greek ritual and ceremony, while the Presbyterian Church extended financial aid. Carefully prepared courses of study were arranged for the ministry of this new church, nearly a score of whom are now studying theology in Manitoba Presbyterian College, and by an interdenominational arrangement these are taking part of their course at Wesley College, Winnipeg, a Methodist institution.

The Independent Church has many features common to Protestantism. It refuses to recognize the authority of the Pope, while its members insist on sending their children, not to the Catholic, but to the Protestant national schools. The report of the Presbyterian Home Mission Committee states that "twenty-four Independent Church ministers are employed in Manitoba and the adjacent provinces." "During the past five years, this Independent Greek Church has built over fifty churches and claims to have a following of about sixty thousand."

The future of this church is a very interesting problem and deserves to be carefully observed. Under the inspiration of religious freedom, the study of the Scriptures and the influence of the public school, they will become Protestant in spirit, if not in form.

It may be in the providence of God that, in this new world, a free and independent Greek Church will grow up, not through the destruction of the old, but by its being filled with a new spirit and a new life.

Home Missions *

HOW many denominations honestly believe that Isaiah was authorized to make the promises he gives in his prophecies to those who do social work? If there was a general belief that these promises would be kept, every church and every individual with an interest in Christ would be eager to engage in the work. The idea of being a Christian is too often comprised in having a pew in a respectable church; in being regular in attendance on the ministry of a preacher who delivers ethical and intellectual sermons; and in contributing liberally to the causes associated with the church. The idea of individual work, of personally seeking outsiders and bringing them into the kingdom of Christ, is not recognized as a duty. Yet here Isaiah is pointing out duties to the fulfillment of which distinct promises are attached. He has evidently a conception of duty to which the ordinary modern Christian is a stranger.

Every church has a home mission organization, either its own or belonging to the whole denomination of which it is a part. The churches need to take the real work into account and to present it so earnestly to the members that they dare not fail to respond. But the churches and the Home Mission Boards are not themselves in earnest, do not realize the extent of the work, or else are in despair at the indifference of individuals.

But it is unlikely that the prophet has money contributions or second-hand efforts in his mind. His demand is for personal service. To feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to open the home to the outcast, there must be actual personal work, and the large promises are to those who engage in this work. In all our cities there are people who oppose Christianity on the ground that Christians have no sympathy with them in their struggles, that they do not aid them to live cleaner, better lives. The charge is true. There will have to be intelligent study of social problems and sincere effort to improve social conditions before these promises will be enjoyed.

Foreign Missions *

ALL American and European Christianity is the product of the foreign missionary spirit. If the little company that stood watching the ascension had remained in their gatherings in Palestine, content to enjoy their recollections of Christ, to ponder on his teachings, and remind one another of his miracles, his death and resurrection, the world would have learned nothing of Christianity. We sometimes think of peace and quiet as being conducive to piety, but it is not so that Christians were intended to live. Paul and his companions did not regard such a life as their ideal. That they were eager and aggressive, indifferent to their own comfort, is evident to the most superficial reader. They were sent of God, he stirred them up to the duty, but we can never forget the instruments who labored and suffered that Christianity might become a world religion.

Having freely received, our duty is to give freely. Our ancestors living in barbarism in Germany, Gaul, and Great Britain were the heathen to whom the Gospel was carried. The benefits they received from it and have passed on to us involve the obligations of foreign missions. The torch was placed in our hands not only to be a light to us, but to be carried to those who are sunk in heathenism as our forefathers were. We are under the obligation of heredity in sending out the missionary. The work is committed to every generation. Above fifty generations have lived and died, and the work is not yet done. The commission which Christ gave is not yet performed. Every year brings it nearer, but it is not yet done. The Acts and the Epistles show with what peril, at what cost of labor and effort, the Gospel came to us. Shall we shrink from the smaller effort of disseminating it under the better and easier conditions! Work is here for all classes, for the heroic missionary who goes to the front, and for the devoted Christian who stays at home and collects funds for his support.

A Delight for All Ages

Dear Dr. Klopsch: This afternoon I received the premium, "Five Hundred Animal Stories." It exceeded my expectations. It is a book for older people as well as children. I have always found your premiums better than advertised. Like my sister, I think your premiums better every year. Many thanks for the good THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has done for me.

Are You Too Thin?

For only 15 minutes a day's practice in your own room upon special exercises that I will give, you can be round, plump, wholesome, rested and attractive. Nature intended you to be—why should you not?

A pupil who was thin writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am! I wore low neck and short sleeves the other night and I was so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 lbs. It has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman. My old dresses look stylish on me now. You remember I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. I guess my stomach must be stronger too, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel as if I had missed so much enjoyment in life, for I never did have such good times before. I feel so well all the time."

I have built up thousands of women—why not you? You will be so much better satisfied with yourself and more attractive to your friends.

I will cheerfully tell you about my work, and if I cannot help your particular case I will tell you so. My information and advice are entirely free.

RAILROAD MAN

Didn't Like Being Starved

A man running on a railroad has to be in good condition all the time or he is liable to do harm to himself and others.

A clear head is necessary to run a locomotive or conduct a train. Even a railroad man's appetite and digestion are matters of importance, as the clear brain and steady hand result from the healthy appetite followed by the proper digestion of food.

"For the past five years," writes a railroader, "I have been constantly troubled with indigestion. Every doctor I consulted seemed to want to starve me to death. First I was dieted on warm water and toast until I was almost starved; then, when they would let me eat, the indigestion would be right back again."

"Only temporary relief came from remedies, and I tried about all of them I saw advertised. About three months ago a friend advised me to try Grape-Nuts food. The very first day I noticed that my appetite was satisfied, which had not been the case before, that I can remember."

"In a week, I believe, I had more energy than ever before in my life. I have gained seven pounds and have not had a touch of indigestion since I have been eating Grape-Nuts. When my wife saw how much good this food was doing me she thought she would try it awhile. We believe the discoverer of Grape-Nuts found the 'Perfect Food.'"

I Can Reduce Your Flesh

Would you like to reduce it by natural means and in a scientific, dignified manner?

I have reduced 15,000 women in the past six years by a few simple directions followed in the privacy of their own rooms.

I can reduce you and at the same time strengthen stomach and heart and relieve you of such chronic ailments as rheumatism, constipation, weak nerves, torpid liver and such difficulties as depend upon good circulation, strong nerves, strong muscles, good blood, correct breathing. You can be as good a figure as any woman of your acquaintance.

One pupil writes:

"Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I feel so well I want to shout! I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, my liver all clogged up and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look."

Send 10 cents for instructive booklet with card for your dressing table, showing correct lines of a woman's figure in poise.

Desecrated Temples

By Mrs. M. Baxter

WHAT is the first thing which Jesus sees in the temple courts when he enters them? "Those that sold oxen, and sheep, and doves, and the changers of money sitting." These things were needed for the ordained sacrifices of the Jewish ritual; but each man was to bring his ox, or his lamb, or goat, to sacrifice. Now, because of the distances many had to come, it was found easier to bring money and to purchase beasts. But it was desecration to have the cattle market in the temple courts.

Here the Saviour heard, not the deep utterances of unspeakable, intense worship, but the quarrelsome haggling of the buyers and sellers; the place of prayer—which was meant to be such for all nations, and which shall yet be such when Christ reigns, and all the families of the earth come up to worship the Lord of Hosts, to keep the feast of tabernacles at Jerusalem (Zech. 14: 16)—had become a bedlam of traffic. He found the hearts of would-be worshipers set upon driving bargains for the animals, or on changing money; and the spirit of true worship was not to be found. He had come up to honor his Father, and he found that the worship which was preparing was to be a mere form, as unacceptable to God as would be the offerings of the heathen set before their idols. He said, not long after, to the Samaritan woman: "God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth."

But what is it that most occupies the hearts of the would-be worshiper in our churches to-day? Is the music of an organ or the voice of too often uninspired choirmen and boys the worship "in spirit and in truth" which he asked for? Is the selfish coming together to enjoy a comforting sermon and favorite hymns, without any real face-to-face meeting with God, the worship "in spirit and in truth" which he asks for? Oh, how much there is in our churches and chapels to grieve him! The buying and selling defiled the courts of the temple. True worship leaves all else to enter into the holy presence of God, to hear him and to speak with him. There is no worship when there is no recognition of the presence of God. That is no worshiper who does not have to do personally with the living God. It is the lack of worshipers which makes our so-called worship what it is.

Or in the silence of our own hearts, when we draw aside from man and things, not to utter a few ordinary prayers as a duty, but in reality to meet with God, and he does come and meet with us and commune with us; how holy is the place with his presence! This is worship. How out of place, how impossible it would be to chant the words which we are led of the Holy Spirit to speak to him! How we want to shut out man and the world from such a holy interview! But in view of our Lord's coming again, oh, how much we find the temple needs cleansing! how impossible, but for the cleansing blood, is such intercourse with him! And how welcome are the humblings through which we pass when he in grace comes with his scourge of small cords to drive out from our hearts all which is not of him.

In Israel, at that day, there was as much external religion as in our so-called Christian lands at the present day, and fully as much unreality and hypocrisy. Twice Christ cleansed the temple—now at the commencement of his ministry, and also at its close (Matt. 21: 12, 13); and each time he claimed the temple as a house of prayer. But the cleansed temple did not remain clean, and in the time of Titus it was finally destroyed till not one stone was left upon another. The time of the great tribulation is coming close upon us, when again there will be a cleansing by scourge, and this time of apostate or hypocritical Christendom. Things cannot go on long as they are now.

PRESIDENT WM. McKINLEY said:

I am familiar with Ridpath's History of the World, and cordially commend it to the scholar as well as to the plain people generally.

BISHOP VINCENT,

Chancellor of Chautauqua, said:

Ridpath's History is in clear and agreeable style; comprehensive in treatment, readable type and admirable illustrations. This set of books is a permanent college chair of general history in one's own house.

THE Publishers Failure

BISHOP NEWMAN said:

In reading Ridpath I experience the pleasure realized when looking at some grand panorama. The superb pictures of temples, palaces, scenes, events and men add a charm to the clear and vigorous style of the learned author.

PROFESSOR WARREN,

Pres't of Boston University, said:

I should be glad to see it placed in the library of every young person in the U.S., and even in the English-speaking world. In families where there are bright children it will render excellent service to the cause of popular intelligence.

CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS ARE OFFERED THE OPPORTUNITY OF A LIFETIME

To place in your homes the World-Famed Publication

Ridpath's History of the World

THE PUBLISHER'S FAILURE placed in our hands the entire unsold edition of this monumental work. BRAND NEW, down to date, beautifully bound in Half-Morocco, which we must sell immediately. We are offering the remaining sets

At LESS than even damaged sets were ever sold

We will name our price only in direct letters to those sending the coupon below. Tear off the coupon, write name and address plainly and mail now before you forget it. Dr. Ridpath's family derive an income from his History, and to print our price broadcast for the sake of more quickly selling these few sets would cause great injury to future sales.

The Christian Herald, in reviewing this great publication, says: "Ridpath's History of the World may be regarded as a complete library in itself. No other work of its kind has ever supplied a History so well suited to the needs of all classes and conditions of men. We mark the marvelous influence of Christianity upon the world's progress. He would be a blind reader of history indeed who did not discern, throughout all, the influence of a great Omnipotent hand, guiding and developing all things. We cheerfully commend this most popular and complete of all world histories to our readers. These nine handsomely bound volumes will make the very best nucleus for a family library, and will be a potent educator of the young and a mine of valuable information for readers of all ages."

9 massive royal octavo volumes, encyclopedia size, 11 in. tall, 8 in. wide. Set boxed weighs 50 lbs., 4,000 double-column pages, 2,000 superb illustrations for Dr. Ridpath's enviable position as an historian is his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian in any generation has ever equaled. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to sit in the Roman senate; to march against Saladin and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan; to watch that thin line of Greek spearmen work havoc with the Persian hordes on the field of Marathon; to know Napoleon as you know Roosevelt. He combines absorbing interest with supreme reliability and makes the heroes of history real living men and women, and about them he weaves the rise and fall of empires in such a fascinating style that history becomes as absorbingly interesting as the greatest of novels. Hundreds who read this have decided to buy Ridpath some day; now is the time. No need for us to tell you about Ridpath. The English-speaking world has pronounced this the only history of the world worth having. It is to-day in 200,000 American homes and is endorsed by Public Men, Educators, Business Men, the Clergy and everybody who knows history.

Why You Ought to Buy Ridpath's History Now

Because it is the only general history recognized everywhere as authority. Because it is complete. It begins with the oldest civilization and gives the complete history of every country and every race; in fact, the history of mankind, including all achievements in war, discovery, invention, art, science, religion, philosophy and government.

Because it is the most beautifully illustrated of any historical work ever issued. It contains more than 2,000 illustrations. A famous educator has said that he considers the illustrations alone worth the entire cost of the set.

Because it will not only interest and instruct the average man or woman, but it will delight the children. It is so beautifully written that children will learn to love history reading. It will start them along the line of reading good things, of becoming interested in that which is true instead of reading novels and trashy literature.

Because the new ninth volume tells the story of recent, we might almost say, current events. It gives the complete history of the Boer War, the Spanish-American War, and the more recent Russia-Japan War. It brings the history of every nation right down to date.

Because Ridpath's History of the World is absolutely accurate and thoroughly reliable. Dr. Ridpath spent the span of an ordinary lifetime in writing the work.

Because this is your chance to buy it at a nominal price—much less than the work has ever been offered before or ever will be offered again—and you may pay in small sums monthly if you prefer.

LIFE UNDER THE EQUATOR

Beautiful Ecuador and the Social Side of Its Picturesque People as an American Traveler Sees Them

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

ECUADOR, while one of the most interesting, is also one of the least known of the South American countries. It takes its name from the equator, yet the heat is not torrid, even on the coast, and Quito, the capital, has a mild and even climate that makes it celebrated. But Quito is in the midst of the Andes nearly 10,000 feet above the sea level. Down at Guayaquil there are greater extremes, not of cold, which does not exist, but of warm weather and of warmer weather.

Yet, unlike the inhabitants of some tropical countries, the people in this torrid zone know what snow is like. They occasionally get a glimpse of the wonderful snow crown of Chimborazo, the most remarkable of all the great extinct volcanoes. When this happens, the air is so clear and transparent that the fleecy white dome seems only a few miles off, though really 200 miles distant.

On the equator, the year is divided into two seasons, summer and winter, but the idea of what constitutes the seasons is peculiar. I was in Guayaquil in November, and again in December, having come down from the mountains at the latter time, and I noticed how much hotter it had become in the interval. Besides, every day the increase in the heat was noticeable. Calling at a shipping office one afternoon after a short but hurried walk, I found myself perspiring freely. The manager handed me a fare and remarked:

"You're beginning to feel our winter heat. We get a bit uncomfortable ourselves by Christmas time."

"You mean summer heat," I said.

"Not at all," he smilingly replied. "We have our winter season from December on, just as you do in the North."

Ecuador was colonized by the Spaniards and they took no account of the difference in latitude, calling the winter months in Ecuador the same as in Spain, notwithstanding the heat. The cool season is during July and August.

Guayaquil is not seen by many travelers, except as they may view it from the ship's deck when the steamer anchors well down the Guayas river in midstream, in order to discharge cargo. The dread of yellow fever, for which the port is noted, keeps them from going ashore. Thomas Nast, the famous cartoonist, who in his old age became consul at Guayaquil, died of the fever after a short service. For those who do land, slats. No protection against the cold is necessary. Out of curiosity one afternoon, I took a walk through several streets to see if by chance some houses had window panes, but I found none.

Much of the commercial importance of Guayaquil comes from the shipment of cacao or chocolate bean. The cacao orchards are located in the lowlands along the river. It is not unusual to see acres of the cacao spread out to dry in front of the warehouses which line the river front. The beans are larger than the lima bean of the United States and much thicker. When you drink chocolate, it is likely that it is made from the cacao of Ecuador.

Guayaquil has a mixed population, as have most of the coast cities of South America; but the foreign element is not so large as in some of them. However, there are Germans, Italians, Americans, English, Syrians and Chinese engaged in business. Notwithstanding that yellow fever is supposed to carry off all foreigners, many of them live to prove that this is not the case. Mr. Cartwright, the British consul, has been there for thirty-six years; and Mr. Jones, the American vice-consul, for a quarter of a century.

It used to take nine or ten days to reach Quito from the coast by means of boats up the rivers, mules, and diligencias or stages. Now the journey is made in two days. This is because a railroad has been built by Americans.

The distance is about three hundred miles. The line was begun ten years ago. It has some remarkable engineering features, including grades of 5½ per cent. and loops that seem to circumscribe the whole of the Andes Mountains. After running through fifty miles or so of level country, grazing pastures, coffee groves and sugar plantations, it starts, as it seems, perpendicularly up the mountain wall, but actually among the canyons, where the rivers have cut a way. One conical mountain, known as the Pistichi or "Devil's Nose," did lie right across the path, and this was climbed by means of a switchback. In the Palmira Pass, an elevation of 10,650 feet is reached; but further there are many points of attraction which cannot be judged from the ship.

Guayaquil has been destroyed by fire several times, but these conflagrations are now pretty well guarded against. The buildings are of bamboo and cane reeds, covered with mortar. While one of them is going up, it looks very flimsy, but when finished it is neat and even substantial. There are many arcades, and the stores, some of which are very fine, are like open bazaars. The best place to see the people, however, is at the market.

Guayaquil is a unique city in one respect, for window glass is unknown. There are plenty of windows in the houses, and these have ordinary wooden blinds with

The Arborescent Paths

TEXT—Proverbs 3: 17
"All her paths are peace"

AT one of our church prayer-meetings I had an experience that I shall never forget. It was one of the happiest of the many such meetings that I have attended. Love seemed to be reigning everywhere. The songs were sung as if every one was enjoying them. The prayers came welling up from the heart as the bubbling brook leaps over the rocks of the mountain-side. The preacher was sitting in his chair, but the meeting was being run by the people. The hour in which we prayed, and sang, and testified was gone too soon. The subject of the evening was: "Why the Christian life should be a happy life, and why it should grow happier each year." It was a great subject to talk upon. Each Christian was able to speak upon it out of the experiences of his own life. Truly, it seemed that each testimony was a little better than the one that had preceded it. Then, when all our hearts were overflowing with gratitude to God for his many mercies, a dear friend arose and told this suggestive incident:

Birds in the Sunshine

"Some time ago, in a Northern city, I was very much depressed. Things seemed to be going against me. I did not know which way to turn. Then, as if to intensify my discomfort, the weather was inclement. It is always harder for me to worship God when the wind is from the east than when the sun is shining. But suddenly the storm seemed to break. From a rift in the clouds the sun burst through and flooded the branches of a great tree just before me. Then, as if by magic, a flock of sparrows came from every direction, and flew up into the branches of that tree, and began to twitter as if in ecstasy. I stopped and said, 'If a lot of sparrows could hunt out a little ray of sunshine like that, and be happy in it, surely I, who can bathe in the sunshine of God's mercies and promises, should be happy too.' When my friend sat down I seemed to be surrounded by a great flood of God's sunshine. In the glow of that sunshine there seemed to arise before me the innumerable blessings which crowd into the Christian's life. And then there came to my mind these beautiful words of my text: 'Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace.'"

The paths of the Gospel are fragrant with peace, first, because those who tread them learn to love the simpler things of life. They have not a vitiated or a depraved taste for pleasure. They can tune their songs of life to the key-note of Channing's Symphony. They love the flowers and the birds and the children. For them, are, above all other pleasures, the sweetest and dearest. They can find endless enjoyment in a walk through the woods and in the cultivation of a garden in their back yard. They would rather gather around the piano in the evening hour, and with the members of their families sing the old Gospel hymns, than hear the most exquisite opera sung by the most famous prima donna imported from foreign lands. They would rather see their children play pranks upon the nursery floor, than go to see the finest tragedians act their masterpieces in the theatre. They do not need cathedrals in which to worship God, or palaces in which to find pleasure; but they can take delight in the simple things of life. Like the poet, they can sing in a garden the words:

Were I, O God, in churchless lands remaining,
Far from all voice of teachers and divines,
My soul would find in flowers of thine ordaining
Priests, sermons, shrines.

I was deeply impressed with this fact in reading the life of Phillips Brooks. That prince of preachers had the simplicity and the tenderness of a child. Witness the regret he had when he felt himself growing out of the companionship of children. Though he had no child of his own, he adopted all the children in the families of his acquaintance. When he entered a home, he was like a big boy out for a frolic. He could not be made to obey the rules and the regulations of the house. He raised the standard of mutiny against decorum, and every child ran to him. He would get down on his knees and play and romp as the merriest boy of the lot. Then, when he was nearing the two-score milestone, he wrote these words of regret to an old Philadelphia parishioner: "The worst thing I see about getting old, or being old, is that you get farther away from the young people, who are the best people in the world. I never see a lot of boys without wanting to be among them, and wishing they would let me into their company, and being sure they won't. I hate to think that boys of sixteen think of me as I used to think of men of thirty-seven when I was their age." Could there be sweeter than that? Could you dream of a great man being simpler or purer in his disposition and gentler and more loving than Phillips Brooks, wanting to play leapfrog or a game of baseball with a lot of boys, when he himself at that time was the honored guest of the great Dean Stanley and was preaching to England's greatest men, who crowded Westminster Abbey to hang on his words?

My friends, one of the most positive proofs that a man is not a true Christian, is when he does not love the simple things of life. His mind and heart and tastes are cloyed with artificial enjoyments. He is living upon ephemeral stimulants. There is not a night when he has to stay at home that he is not restless. No sooner is the evening meal ended than he says: "This is stupid! No need of sitting around here. Let us go to the theatre." Or he says: "Come, let us go to Mrs. So-and-So's card party." Or, "I must do something. Let us go to the club and have a game of billiards." Or when summer comes, he hies away to the fashionable hotel where he can turn night into day and day into night. And he is never happy unless he is intoxicated with some kind of excitement. To such a man I would say: My brother, what you need is

A Change of Heart

What you need is to get close to God. What you need is to have so much divine grace that you will think it a sufficient amusement when you can play a childhood game with your five-year-old daughter, and when you can enjoy an entertainment of a magic lantern show, made out of an old sheet hung up in your parlor, with the magic lantern slides being run by your little boy. "I never pick a lily out of the garden," said a poor dressmaker in my home some time ago, "but it says to me, 'See how happy I am on account of God's goodness to me.' Why? Because, like Enoch, she was walking with God. And so, my brother and sister, if you once get your hearts right with Christ, the smallest and the most insignificant things of life, like the prattle of a child, the sight of two little kittens tumbling upon the floor, the merry-makings of a lot of boys playing baseball in the back lots, will offer to you an endless variety of amusement. Oh that you and I could be like Phillips Brooks, and never outgrow our love of simple, innocent pleasure.

The Christian's ways are pleasant, also, because they are full of peace. As he treads the path of life, he has that wonderful peace which passeth all understanding, and he says, "There is a divine power guiding me and mine. Wherever I go and whatever I do, his hand is leading me and his arm is defending me. My path of life may appear checkered, but God will never let me or mine get beyond the reach of his protecting love. All things work together for good to those that love God." Oh, my brother, can you not feel what a glorious peace comes over the wayfarer in the journey of life, when he fully realizes that God is leading him and protecting him? He is on the highway of wisdom, and all "her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."

Lost in the Woods

Some of us have been travelers, and we know only too well the disquietude and the anxiety which comes over us when we realize that we have strayed from the right path. And oh, the joy that wells up in the heart when we recognize some familiar place from which we can find our way back home! Some time ago, I was camping in the wild regions of Humboldt County, California. We left the beaten paths and struck into a side road and went to the end of the road, and there we pitched camp for deer-hunting. One morning, about three o'clock, we arose and started after game. After a while it began to rain in torrents; but still we kept on. Then, after we had hunted for some six or eight hours, we decided to make a short cut over the mountains and get back to camp. We climbed the mountain and pushed our way on for an hour or two. Then the whole topography of the country seemed to change. We were lost! With no food and no means to build a campfire; with dripping clothes and empty stomachs, the situation was anything but inviting. How to get back to camp we did not know, unless we retraced our steps to the place whence we started for the short cut. So back we went. Yet, as we tramped along, everything was so strange. At last, after a long pull and tug, we cried, "Safe at last!" for we had sighted some familiar landmarks. And though we had still miles upon miles to travel, and though the rain was falling in torrents, we cared not. For we knew each step we were taking was leading us nearer home. It is a happy feeling, after one has been lost for hours in the woods, to find the familiar path that leads him back to fire and food and blessed sleep.

Christ's Guidance

Well, the same feeling I had when lost among the mountains of Humboldt County, and then striking the trail for home, is the feeling the Christian has when Christ becomes his guide. In the first place he is completely lost. He is lost on the mountains of sin. Every step he takes is a step in the dark, and seems to be leading him farther and farther away from his Father's house. As he tramps along in the lonely mountains of sin, the fierce-eyed monsters of trouble leap out of the thickets and assail him and the loved ones he carries in his arms, and it is dark and growing darker every minute. But suddenly, out of the darkness, there comes the figure of a man. He has a beautiful face. It is the face of a man, and yet it has on it the signs of divinity. He reaches out his hands to the lost traveler, and says: "What! lost? Lost in the mountains of sin? Follow me, and I will lead thee back to thy Father's house!" And as soon as that gentle Christ takes our hands to guide us, our anxiety disappears. Then perfect peace throbs in the heart, and trouble and despair give place to hope and triumph. "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."

But there is another fact I want you to notice about these paths of Gospel peace. They are the most healthful of all paths to travel. They will give clearness to the eye. They will give breadth to the chest. They will give strength to the nerves and the muscles. They will give wonderful resiliency to the brain. And they will make men drink out of the fountain of perpetual youth. The simple fact is, a great many people are sick, not because they need medicine, but because they need the grace of God in their hearts to make them tread the paths of peace. Then while they get spiritual health they will find their physical health renewed also. And all this can be demonstrated on physiological grounds.

Escape from Worry

In the first place, if you will only learn to trust God, you are going to be emancipated from useless worry, that awful physical and mental curse which is racking your whole organism to pieces. You remind me of a little child who goes to bed and is frightened with a foolish dream. You put your little boy to bed and kiss him good-night, and he rolls over and goes to sleep. But in the middle of the night you are awakened by a heartrending cry, "Oh, mamma!" You call out, "Yes, my dear, come into bed with mamma." And your baby crawls into bed and you say, "Did my baby have bad dreams?" and he answers, "Yes, mamma, a great big bear was running after me and almost caught me up." Then you say, "Never mind, my darling; just lie close to mamma, and she will not let the bear touch you." Then your boy nestles down by your side and goes quietly to sleep.

Now, my brother, that is the trouble with you. You have a whole herd of bears running after you. One of

A ZULU CHIEF BUILDS A CHURCH

THE number of Zulu chiefs who have become real Christians is so small that it is a very noteworthy thing when one such is found. As a rule, they cannot read nor write, and they despise the ways of civilization. Generally, when they have been taught and civilized before they became chiefs, they go back to heathenism when they come into power.

Dinizulu, son of Cetshwayo, King of the Zulus, was taught when in exile at St. Helena, but he is scarcely different from other heathen chiefs now. Another chief of one of the largest Zulu tribes in Natal went to America and spent several years in school; but now he could hardly be distinguished from other heathen. A remarkable exception is Ndunge, chief of Qwabi, near Umzumbi. He was converted before he became chief, and was taught in our evangelists' training school at Amanzimtoti; but he has never given up his religion nor the ways of civilization. He is an active Christian, industrious and frugal, and, in company with his people, has bought a farm and built a brick house good enough for any civilized farmer. He has always had a school building and church on the farm, and when there is no preacher or missionary from the mission station, he conducts the services himself. He has just finished a new chapel (dedicated the other day), which is the best I know that has been built entirely by the natives themselves. He said it cost $750, besides the work which the people gave. The walls are of concrete, smoothly plastered, are nicely tinted inside, and overhead the ceiling is neatly varnished. The roof is of galvanized iron, and on three sides is a spacious veranda, which serves for an overflow congregation which can hear through the open windows. At the back are two cosy rooms which can serve as vestry or class rooms, or, as Ndunge said, for the missionaries.

The photograph, which I took just after we came out from the dedication service, does not do it justice. As there is no steeple, the building looks like a dwelling-house; but steeples offering this house up to thee, thou art answering as thou didst of old, with a voice from heaven, and sending a shower of blessing upon the roof." And all the people said, "Amen!"

In the remarks which Ndunge made, it appeared that the house was not built by him as chief, but by all the people, as the house of God. He praised the efforts of the women, most of whom were from the kraals, to whom a shilling is a rarer thing than a gold eagle is to most white people in comfortable circumstances. They gave $1.25 apiece, besides their work.

This is one of many examples which may be shown in Africa of what can be done by voluntary contributions. It is certainly the ideal way to advance the kingdom. But the plan which is now being pursued on our mission reserves, of compelling the people to pay rents for an educational fund, is regarded as anything but ideal. Instead of being glad to do it, as Ndunge's people were, it makes them bitter against us missionaries. We may possibly net more money in that way, and build more expensive houses; but instead of being helpful to the Gospel, it is disastrous. That is my opinion; but I am sorry to say that many others do not think so.

those big bears is going to eat up your business; and another one of those big bears is going to swallow down your good name; and another is going to steal your child, and another to steal your home. You are frightened with foolish dreams. These dreams, called worry, are racking your whole body to pieces. You cannot sleep by night and you cannot rest by day, and you cannot properly digest your food. What you should do is what your little baby does when he has bad dreams. He knows you will take care of him and let no harm come to him. What you need to do is to nestle close up to God's heart. He will take care of you. He will never fail you. Then, if you can only grasp this infinite truth, all this useless worrying will leave you. And in no wise will the value of the Gospel be shown quicker than in the benefit to your physical health.

But there is another fact I want you to learn about these Gospel paths of peace. The longer you travel them, the more beautiful they become; the more you will be stimulated by their fragrance, and the more they will reveal to you the messages of God's love. They will be to you just what the paths of the woods are to the lover of nature. The farther he travels over them, the more fascinating and beautiful he finds them.

I might appeal for confirmation to the experience of any aged Christian. You, with your white hair and trembling limbs; you, who are leaning on your staff; you have been following the Gospel paths of peace now for over half a century. Tell me, you with your fourscore years, is not Jesus more precious to you than he was when, as a ruddy-cheeked lad, you first surrendered your heart to him? "Oh, yes," answers the aged Christian. "As I look back over my long life, like the Psalmist I can say: 'I have been young but now am old, yet have I never seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread.' My journey has been a long, hard journey. Sometimes it was away in the mountains. Sometimes it was down in the valleys of despond. Sometimes my feet have stumbled. Sometimes I have had to look into the gaping mouths of opened graves. But Christ has never forsaken me. Each month and each year he has been drawing closer to me. And now he is so much a part of my being, that I never breathe the fragrance of a flower, I never hear a bird sing, I never see a star twinkle, I never see a man's or a woman's or a child's face, but I hear a voice singing in my heart, 'God is love. God is love. God is love.'"

Come, aged mother in Israel. What is your testimony? In the kitchen and parlor, and nursery and home, you have had your trials. Is Jesus Christ nearer and dearer to you, as the years roll on and the time draws nigh when you will see them face to face? "Yes, yes!" answers the beautiful-faced saint. "As I think of what Christ is to me now, and what he always has been, truly I can say there is one name above every name and one love above every love. Oh, truly, Christ is dearer to me then ever before. Like all Christians, I can say, 'God is love.'" Truly, "the path of the righteous is as the dawning light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

And then the terminus of the Gospel paths of peace. Oh, what a glorious, a triumphant peace they have! As all roads, during Caesar's reign, were said to lead to Rome, so all the Gospel paths of peace ultimately converge at one great central destination. They all meet at the foot of the great White Throne of God. And all those who travel them shall assemble there. In the many paths of the dense woods of earth, you can pass within a few yards of your friends and miss them entirely; but there is no danger of ever losing those who travel the Gospel paths of peace. You see, we cannot miss each other. We are all heading to the same destination. We are all going to assemble in the one place, where we shall sing the same songs, and look upon the face of the same Christ, and live there through all eternity in the same mansions. Oh, is it not glorious news that those who have gone before us, and our dear children who are coming behind us, shall yet be one with us in glory?

While I was writing this sermon, I seemed to see a most wonderful vision. I saw a beautiful picture. In apocalyptic vision, I saw the members of my church traveling those paths of peace, and all meeting there at the foot of the throne. Then I saw us one day going off alone and assembling as a congregation, just as we do here Sabbath by Sabbath. We were singing the old songs and meeting in holy fellowship, just as we do here. And in my vision I saw myself arise and repeat the beautiful words of my text: "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."

Among the Workers

—REV. ARTHUR J. SMITH, evangelist, has been conducting a very successful series of meetings at Waterford, N. Y. The Presbyterian, Baptist and Methodist Churches united in the work, and the Y. M. C. A. gave its hearty co-operation.

—MRS. HARRIS, wife of Bishop Harris, writes from Tokio, Japan, that between 100,000 and 200,000 homes were inundated by the recent floods in Japan. In Hakodate, island of Yezo, there are 60,000 homeless, many of them absolutely destitute.

—EVANGELIST SUNDAY's revival campaign in Burlington and Davenport, Ia., recently, resulted in the closing of the saloons in these two cities, the local authorities having decided to enforce the law, which requires the closing of barrooms on all holidays.

—OCEAN GROVE, N. J., is to have the most powerful organ in the world. It will cost $26,000 and will be installed in June next, in time for use at the camp-meeting. Leading organists of England and the United States will be invited to play on this magnificent instrument.

—PASTOR GUSTAV BLOMGREN, who is now conducting Gospel work among the Finlanders in Illinois, has a wide parish. He preaches in two mission churches in Chicago, but in Indiana, Wisconsin and Michigan also, at regular stated intervals. In some places the Finns had not heard a sermon in their own language for several years.

—THE REVIVAL MEETINGS at Broken Bow, Neb., under the direction of Evangelist H. W. Bromley, of Wilmore, Ky., were largely attended. The meetings at Ansley, Neb., were even greater. As a work of grace, these were remarkable for the number of men reached. Evangelist Bromley is now engaged in a union meeting at Farnam, Neb.

—REV. ANDREW BEATTIE, of Canton, China, writes: "I find waiting me two checks from the HERALD for my Leper Children's Home. Ten boys and girls have been taken from the leper village and are being trained for useful service. One young man is now preaching the Gospel. We are planning to take several more children from the leper village."

—REV. G. D. HALL of Stromsburg, Neb., writes: "During the last illness of King Oscar II. of Sweden, he suffered severe pains, and Queen Sophie was close by his bed, holding his hand and repeating promise after promise from God's Word. The King was rapidly sinking into his last sleep. The Queen bowed down and whispered in his ear: 'And the blood of Jesus, his Son, cleanse us from all sin.' The King answered: 'Thanks, Jesus!' Then he fell peacefully asleep."

HE PUT THE MOTTO ON THE COINS

Pennsylvania's Christian Governor, James Pollock, the Friend of Lincoln, Was the Author

I READ with much interest the series of letters in a late issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, condemning the removal from our coins of the motto "In God We Trust." I regretted that not one of the authors of said letters gave the name of the great and good man by whose suggestion the motto was put there. In fact, one of the best arguments for permitting the motto to remain there is the splendid Christian character, sound judgment, and high standing of the man who put it there. That man was Hon. James Pollock, Governor of Pennsylvania, next preceding the great war governor, Andrew G. Curtin.

In 1861, President Lincoln appointed Ex-Governor Pollock Director of the United States Mint; Hon. Salmon P. Chase being then Secretary of the Treasury. It is well known that President Lincoln and Mr. Pollock were very intimate, and while Secretary Chase, as an official, would be called upon to approve so important a matter as a motto on our coins, it is not doubted that Mr. Lincoln was consulted and also approved the motto. Further, the bill framed by Gov. Pollock and providing for the motto, passed both Senate and House by a unanimous vote. It is hoped the present Congress will as unanimously order its use again.

Governor Pollock has been called the great Christian Governor of Pennsylvania, as Curtin was called its great war governor. He was a Christian gentleman in all that the term implies. He was a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church for wellnigh a generation. He began life by taking first honors at Princeton College, N. J., while in his later years his sterling honesty and great ability as a lawyer put him in charge of many of Pennsylvania's leading cases.

All the way between his graduation and his retirement and death he was a man among men, keen, farsighted, and of rare good judgment. As a congressman he was a friend of Prof. S. F. B. Morse, and took the lead in getting through Congress the bill appropriating the money to build the experimental telegraph line between Baltimore and Washington. Away back in 1848, on the floor of Congress, he prophesied the building of a transcontinental railway, and later put through that body the bill that built the Union Pacific.

He was inaugurated Governor of Pennsylvania in 1855. As we have said, he was the personal friend of President Lincoln, who sent for and consulted him as to the state of the country and formation of a Cabinet, the day following his (Lincoln's) arrival in Washington. He, Governor Pollock, was the only one present at the historical first meeting of Lincoln and Douglas, after the latter's defeat. He was made Director of the United States Mint by appointment of President Lincoln, and was reappointed by President Grant. For many years he was an elder, Sunday School Superintendent and teacher in the West Arch Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. For years he was President of the Board of Trustees of Lafayette College and President of the American Sunday School Union. All these and many other positions of trust and honor enjoyed the gifted Governor's care and attention.

Those who would remove the motto now are setting their judgment, in a day of prosperity, over against the combined judgment of Lincoln, Pollock, and the United States Congress, in a day of adversity, and against the combined judgment of the best Christian people to-day—the good and the great in church and State all over the land.

Hence, it would seem that the writers of your many letters have missed one of the most unanswerable of arguments—the judgment of Lincoln and Pollock, the great and good men who put the motto "In God We Trust," where it ought to remain.

Ex-Governor Pollock spent his last years here at Lockhaven, Pa., and we knew him so well that I could have made this article much more emphatic and still kept within the truth. His prayer-meeting talks were veritable revelations, and I sometimes think his prayers were a revelation perhaps to the angels.

on the elevation is about twelve thousand feet. The trains stop overnight at a town called Riobamba, and this is an advantage, for it is a good place on a clear day to get a view of Chimborazo and the whole chain of snow-covered volcanic mountains, living and dead.

Cotopaxi, the volcanic mountain, is seen further along the line. Occasionally it is quiet, but never for a very long time. If it were so, this would mean danger to the whole Inter-Andine region of Ecuador, because it would foreshadow an eruption perhaps similar to that at St. Pierre. But the volcano of Cotopaxi has been vomiting lava and pumice stone and smoke intermittently for centuries, and, being like an open stovepipe, there is not much chance of its breaking out from the sides. When I saw the volcano, it was sending up enormous masses of smoke in black clouds that obscured the sky, and effectually hid the sun from view.

Quito is a picturesque type of the solid cities which the Spanish conquerors built in the valleys and plateaus of the Andes, as capitals of the different regions. But it is more interesting historically from having been one of the capitals of the ancient Incas and a centre of their primitive civilization. To-day, it is interesting and picturesque on account of the presence of the Quichua Indians, who are of the race of the ancient Incas.

A Switchback Railroad in the Mountains

TINY CRIPPLES AS ENTERTAINERS

NEW YORK is having all kinds of winter weather this year. Sometimes it rains and snows and blows simultaneously with equal force and perversity. Umbrellas are turned inside out, people lose their hats and are blown into slush puddles nearly knee deep. It was during a spell of weather of this sort that a little band of children from the William H. Davis Free Industrial School for Crippled Children in New York came on a recent evening to the Bowery Mission. They had promised to give an entertainment for the men of the Bowery. Seldom, perhaps never, has any evening been more thoroughly enjoyed or appreciated, and all who were present or knew about it were impressed with the lesson in unselfishness it afforded. That these little folks, seemingly more unfortunate than any other class of human beings, should have been able to give to able-bodied men cheer and sunshine proved that a generous and merry heart really has very little connection with outward circumstances.

From the moment they arrived—most of them came in the wagonette which belongs to the school, although a few used the street cars—the Mission seemed to be filled with jollity. They were escorted to the kitchen, where they were to put on their costumes. Here they played with each other and tumbled about in such a reckless way that one of the Mission workers was frightened.

"I'm afraid you children will hurt yourself," he said to a mite in a steel brace, who had just fallen down.

"Oh, no," she assured him, picking herself up, "we never get hurt." And on they romped.

Soon Mrs. Arthur Elliot Fish, the President of the school, arrived. She brought quiet and order out of the tumbling crowd, for the children know and obey her. Then the entertainment began. First there was an opening chorus, "It's Great to Be a Soldier Man"; then drills and songs by the kindergarten children and a recitation by "Elizabeth," who immediately captured the hearts of her audience with her quaint and amusing ways. Several solos followed, one by little Andy, who sang a Chinese song and imitated the odd step of the yellow men.

"Dimples," the mischief of the school, won applause by his songs and recitations, as did the quartette of which he was a member. "Cornelia," one of the older girls, and one of the cleverest workers in the school, was roundly clapped for a little song called "Over in the Corner where the Dark Comes Most."

At the end, there was a "Star and Sunflower" drill by the whole company. Nowhere could any band of children be found quicker in their motions, or gayer or happier than these little ones. "Dimples" and "Eliza-supporting. We have proved that none are too helpless or too feeble to do a little. If this is true of these children, it is certainly true of the men in this audience. Every one of you can do something."

The work of training these crippled children has attracted wide attention and sympathy. The school building at 471 West Fifty-seventh Street accommodates between sixty and seventy little folks. They live in their own homes, and are called for each morning in the wagonette, and sent home at five in the afternoon. A few who come from other places are boarded by the school in some private home, often with the families of other children. They are drilled in the ordinary kindergarten, primary, and grammar classes, but emphasis is laid on the manual training. The girls are taught sewing, weaving, and paper work; the boys, leather tooling and wood carving. The best teachers are employed, and the work is remarkably beautiful and finds a ready sale, for there is nothing produced that one would not be glad to have in his home. Each child is paid for the time he devotes to practical employment, and many have savings accounts, which they use either for their own support, or give to their parents. In some cases, these parents may have been directly responsible for the condition of the child, but the child's instinctive affection is deep and forgiving.

At noon a hot dinner is served to the little pupils, and in the afternoon a simple service is held—reading from the Bible, prayer and singing. No color, creed, or race, but only lack of room bars any child from the advantages of the school. Deformity and incapacity are never talked about. The children are made to feel that they are not peculiar, but have a place in the world and a work to do. As a result, one can go into the school and almost forget the physical weaknesses in the cheer, the smiles, the ready obedience, the politeness, which pervades its atmosphere.

In summer the children are taken to the school's country home at Claverack, N. Y., a fine country residence, which was given by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Thorley in memory of their daughter. Here the children play out-of-doors for several months. Mrs. Fish spends her summer at the home, and gives her entire time to loving and caring for her clever little well-trained charges. beth" were the prime favorites; but there was not a child who had not his full share of applause, and no trace of jealousy was found in the group of stars.

In the audience there were smiles, laughter and some tears.

A Great Concert at the Bowery Mission

THE members of the Amateur Concert Club, which is composed exclusively of ladies of the most prominent families known in New York society, gave a concert to the poor men of the Bowery, in the Mission, on Tuesday evening, January 7. When, in the closing item of their programme, they sang the Christmas carol, "O Holy Night," and sweet voices of the singers were heard tenderly uttering the words

A thrill of hope the weary world rejoices,
For yonder breaks a new and glorious morn.

we felt that, in a measure, but very really, the new day had come and the old prophecy was being fulfilled, "The rich and poor meet together: the Lord is maker of them all."

Miss Field, the President of the Club, is one of the highest types of American Christian womanhood, and under her direction these ladies are inaugurating a method of work which is likely to accomplish great results in bridging over the chasm that exists between the rich and the poor of this country. The unselfish, altruistic spirit, and the generous motives which call the Club into existence, have found a peculiarly appropriate field in the Bowery. Nowhere has music proved itself such an inspiring, refining, and soothing influence as amongst the homeless and friendless.

the Club gives every year, this act of disinterested kindness in coming down into the nether-world, and meeting face to face hopeless and discouraged men, has had a moral effect that it is impossible to exaggerate. The results of the kindness of these New York City ladies, has, we know, been a wonderful reinforcement to the ordinary rescue work of the Mission.

It was a pitilessly wet night. Rain and sleet swirled down upon the sidewalks and flooded the gutters; but they were not sufficient to prevent an enormous crowd of men gathering an hour before the time of commencing. Very punctually, however, the procession of automobiles arrived and deposited their fair occupants and the concert began.

Miss Marie Kieckhoefer, the charming and versatile Secretary of the Club, appeared, as formerly, with her 'cello, and played in the opening trio with Mr. A. Rosenstein, piano, and Mr. David Hennen Morris, violin. Mr. Lawrence Butler, a pupil of Jean De Reszke, and possessing a magnificent baritone voice, sang several solos. Miss Dorothy Innis and Mrs. Berry Wall were the soprano soloists, whilst Miss Gladys Rice and Miss Marion Gaylord rendered in very beautiful fashion, respectively, violin and harp solos.

A psychological student would have found a most engrossing study in the faces of the poor beaten, baffled, discouraged men, as they listened to these instrumental solos, the subjects of which were selected with great discernment, and rendered with exquisite feeling. When, in response to an inexorable encore, Miss Gaylord played on the harp the simple strains of "Home, Sweet Home," there were many men who bowed their heads and wept.

The lighter portion of the programme fell to the lot of Miss Cornelia Barnes, who recited Eugene Field's "Night Wind" and several humorous pieces with great effect, and to Mr. Evert Wendell, the famous Harvard College man of former days, and the equally famous New York philanthropist of the present time. Mr. Wendell, by his genial manner and really humorous singing, gave the "boys" a treat they will long remember.

Probably, however, the greatest effect of all was produced by the singing of the Choral Club, containing twenty young lady members, under the direction of Mr. Rosenstein, with Miss Rosamund Street at the piano. Their first item was Mendelssohn's "Cradle Song," and their last, "O Holy Night." Each man held in his hand a printed copy of the words, and as, under the spell of Adolph Adams' tender but powerful music, they gathered the glorious significance of the message, I saw many a lip quiver, and many eyes were moistened with tears. J. G. HALLIMOND, Superintendent.

THERE is no abatement in the popular movement throughout the country in favor of restoring the motto "In God We Trust" to the national coinage. Two bills are now before Congress for that purpose. When the great flood of letters demanding restoration began to pour in upon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, it was decided that these letters could be used most effectively in convincing Congress of the popular feeling on the subject. They were accordingly forwarded to the Hon. Ollie M. James of Kentucky, the author of the first bill for restoration.

Congressman James, in acknowledging receipt of this voluminous correspondence, writes the following letter, which is of interest to all who wish to see the grand old motto put back on the coins:

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

"WASHINGTON, January 7, 1908.

"Mr. Louis Klopsch, Editor CHRISTIAN HERALD.

"MY DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of recent date, together with two express packages containing hundreds of letters from various citizens of the United States, petitioning for the restoration of the ancient motto 'In God We Trust,' upon our coins.

"I regretted exceedingly to see the President issue the order taking this motto from our money, and think it was a great mistake. This great republic believes in a Supreme Being, and wherever our money goes, to the farthest parts of the earth, we wanted those who saw it to see that the first republic of the western hemisphere placed its trust, not in floating navies nor in tramping armies, but in God. The President's objection that some person might make fun of it, if carried to its logical conclusion, would tear down every church spire and pull up every altar of worship, because somebody might make fun of these sacred places. But two thousand years ago the Bible told us that such there would be, 'For the fool hath said in his own heart, "There is no God."'

"I appreciate very much the earnest endeavor that you are putting forth in behalf of the bill which I have introduced to restore this motto, and you and those who think with you may rest assured that I will do all possible to secure this legislation. I suggest that those interested in this matter ought to write to their members of Congress, asking them to support this bill.

"Yours very truly, OLLIE M. JAMES."

We trust that all of our readers and their friends who have not already done so, will write at once to the Congressional representatives from their respective districts, urging them to support restoration, as Congressman James suggests. Prompt action now may win the battle while delay may sacrifice every advantage that has been gained.

Overworked College Women

PRESIDENT SEELYE of Smith College, one of the famous quartet of American colleges for women, has flung a bombshell into the camp of the advocates of the higher education for the gentle sex. In his annual report he roundly condemns the preparatory requirements as inducing hurried and superficial work, as too prolonged, and hence too expensive for any but the wealthy, and lastly, because the system as it stands today contributes to the modern tendency to celibacy.

In plain words, President Seelye believes that the worst evil that could befall a woman's college would be to have educational conditions so hard, and the time of graduation so long delayed, that family life would be impaired in consequence. That these conditions do prevail he assures us, and he adds, convincingly: "An inferior quality of scholarship is produced where the pupil is hurried over so much ground that one study soon obliterates the impression made by another. Physicians complain that entrance requirements seriously interfere with normal physical development. Not enough time is left for rest and outdoor exercise."

This frank admission, by one usually recognized as an advocate of the highest standard in female education, should be weighed carefully by parents and teachers. If it be true, as the professor asserts—and we presume he speaks from long personal observation and study of the subject—that prolonged and arduous entrance training is hostile to marriage, people will naturally ask why it should not be so modified as to remove the objectionable features. He says: "The longer marriage is delayed, the less likely men are to marry," which is indisputable, though it might be said with equal truth of men or women, either in or out of college.

But even apart from the marriage question, the evils of which the professor complains should be dealt with and the proper remedy applied. College life for women should be made worth while. Over-study to the point of physical and nervous exhaustion is a painfully familiar feature of our present high school system; but few people were prepared to find its existence admitted in our women's colleges. Yet when we are told that the requirements have been more than doubled in these colleges in recent years, we can better comprehend the hard struggle many of these delicate young students have to undergo, and we cease to wonder why so many break down under the unhygienic, unscientific and absurd demands made upon mind and body, at a time of life when both should be in process of harmonious and healthy development.

The Problem of Poverty

A RELIABLE statement has been issued from a committee that has exceptional means of knowing the facts, that at the present time there are in New York alone one hundred and sixty thousand men who are seeking employment. These represent families of various numbers, but probably not falling far short of half a million mouths, for which there is no provision but such as comes by charity. A significant feature of this startling fact is that a majority of the men do not belong to the ranks of unskilled labor, but are men skilled in building and mechanical industries, and nearly half of them members of Trades Unions.

Society is thus face to face with the problem of poverty in acute form, for, though New York is doubtless in worse shape than other cities, being the magnet which draws the unemployed from all sections, its condition is representative of other cities. It is useless now to attempt to apportion the blame for this crisis; the urgent duty is to seek a remedy.

That the situation is a disgrace to a civilized community must be admitted. Things have been managed badly by the statesmen and philosophers, when they have come to this pass. That men who know a trade, who are willing and anxious to work, who do not desire charity but will gladly do good work for the food and shelter they need, should be homeless and starving amid plenty, is a sign of mismanagement in the classes who assume to regulate social conditions. Even a horse is sure of a stable and corn so long as he is able to work, yet here are men to whom such comforts are unattainable.

It is a sign of the patience and strength of character of the American workingman that hitherto he has displayed so marked a respect for law and the rights of property. It is a fierce test to a man's principles when he is not only hungry but sees the signs of hunger in his wife's face and hears the pitiful wails of his children as they plead for food, yet holds back his hand from taking the thing that does not belong to him. He sees luxury on every hand; men and women wearing costly clothes and jewelry; sees them feasting in hotels and restaurants as he walks the street, yet refrains from crime. All honor to him! He has a manly spirit, and society hopes—and with reason—that his self-control will continue.

Is the church of Christ doing its duty in the circumstances? If it had done its duty in the past, would matters have come to such a crisis? When Christ laid down the principles of the kingdom of God and preached universal brotherhood, could he have contemplated the prospect that, nineteen centuries after his death, so little would have been done toward realizing his ideal? Ask one of these unemployed, hungry men if there is a kingdom of God on earth, and he would look at his questioner incredulously. Yet Christ intended us to work toward this object of bringing the kingdom of God to the earth, this kingdom of love and brotherhood.

It is not to be achieved by dividing the property of the world, as revolutionists claim; nor by creating classes as unionists claim; but by the Church taking up the long-neglected problem and honestly striving to solve it. We may wisely let questions of doctrine and church government fall into abeyance for a time, while we consider this urgent matter. There is no time to be lost, for even at this moment some soul may be going up to God, driven out of its frail body by starvation, to tell him that in this land of wealth it could not get a loaf of bread without stealing it.

A Scientist's Conclusion

ONE of the most distinguished scientists of this age, Lord Kelvin, passed away lately at the advanced age of eighty-three. His achievements in the higher domain of research were acknowledged throughout the world. It was his inventions that made ocean telegraphy a commercial possibility. His theories concerning the nature of the earth's core or interior, and as to the beginnings of life on this planet; his knowledge of electricity, and the wonderful experiments by which he demonstrated that the air we breathe is divided into countless myriads of tetrakadekahedrons, or fourteen-sided invisible particles, won him universal recognition as a master-mind in these varied fields of investigation.

Yet with all his knowledge, which placed him far above the average scientist, Lord Kelvin himself admitted that he had never found, in the course of his long life of investigation, anything to shake his faith in God. On one occasion, he received a letter from a correspondent who was in doubt concerning religion, and who turned to the great scientist in his difficulty, seeking for light. "Is there a God?" he asked. He would know whether the man of far-reaching knowledge had not become convinced, through his investigations, that the claims of religion were false. Lord Kelvin made a memorable reply. "I find science full of the evidence of God," he wrote, "and I find no reading of theological books necessary to keep me contented with the Christian religion of my childhood."

Such is the testimony of one who was great among men, yet who, throughout a remarkable career, found nothing in science to shake his religious convictions, and who clung with the simplicity of a child to the faith he had learned at his mother's knee.

A Great Book of World Travel

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Have received the exquisite Calendar for 1908. I shall take pleasure in telling my friends about your beautiful premiums. I have traveled a great many miles, but have never been able to visit so many countries at such a low rate as you give me the opportunity of doing with Mr. and Mrs. Alexander, in "Twice Around the World." It is certainly a grand book and an excellent premium, and I trust many will take advantage of your liberal offer. With best wishes for the New Year, MRS. M. A. WHITBECK.

Americans Attacked on the Congo

NEWS has reached Washington, D. C., of a desperate fight in the Congo Free State. The International Corporation in which Thomas F. Ryan and the Guggenheims are interested, had sent a band of explorers to survey the territory which the Belgian Government has granted them as a concession. Several members of the United States Geological Survey were in the party, which also comprised a regiment of native soldiers and carriers, and several Belgian officials. Starting from Boma on the Atlantic coast, the party marched through the jungle toward the head waters of the Kasai River. Their purpose was to examine the capacities of the concession in rubber and metals. They entered the concession near Kamsella, and had proceeded about five miles when they were attacked by a large force of natives armed with old-fashioned flint-lock muskets. The natives fought with desperate ferocity, and though the Americans had the best arms and equipment that money could buy, they were forced to retreat. They killed 125 of the attacking force, but the survivors were desperate, and followed the retreating expedition with reckless courage. The Americans made all the haste possible, covering their rear with the native soldiers. The journey which had occupied eight days in coming, was done in three days in returning, with the harassing enemy in the rear. None of the white men was hurt, but five of the native carriers were killed and many were wounded. The explorer who sends the report alleges that the attacking force was largely composed of cannibals who regard the flesh of the white man as a delicacy. That, however, may be merely an alarmist report, as the white men evidently did not get into close contact with them, but kept them at a distance with their superior weapons. It is intended to persevere with the expedition, as Belgian protection is promised. There is reason therefore, to fear that this is only the beginning of slaughter. The natives are evidently desperate, and will not be warned by their losses against further attacks. They cannot understand the right of the Belgian King to grant concessions of their land, and if they have heard anything of the American nation, must be still more surprised that Americans have accepted the concession. Nor do they know how little chance they have with their rude weapons of defending their land and themselves against men intent on gain, and equipped with weapons of precision, who come regardless of national honor to despoil and slay them. We can but pity them and deplore the penalty they must suffer. Now, as in ancient times, the righteous man must confess:

I saw the oppressions that are done under the sun; and behold the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comforter; and on the side of their oppressors there was power. (Eccles. 4: 1.)

Offers a Million to Doctors

The physicians on the staff of a hospital in Pittsburg, Pa., are discussing an offer made by a multi-millionaire recently. There was brought to the hospital some time ago a man whose illness from the first was recognized as critical. A constant visitor was the millionaire, who, as the danger increased, spent most of his time at the patient's bedside. He was intensely anxious, and begged the doctors to do all they could to save his life. It became necessary at last to tell him that the patient could not live many hours. The millionaire was almost frantic with grief, and wanted to get two famous physicians from New York by special train. He said the patient was the dearest friend he had in the world. They had gone to Pittsburg together as poor boys, and they had been as inseparable as brothers. He besought the doctors to make another effort and pledged himself to give them a million dollars if they could save his friend's life. They assured him that no doctor on earth could do anything in the case. The patient died that night and the millionaire wept like a child. He declared that he would gladly have given a million dollars, and more, if necessary, if the life of his friend could have been saved. He is learning a useful lesson: that there are limits to the power of money. He appears to have supposed that what the doctors could not do for their own credit and for humanity's sake, they might do for money. He was probably too distracted with anxiety to realize what an insult that was. He had to do with death, against which money is no protection.

* Will he esteem thy riches? No, not gold, nor all the forces of strength. (Job 36: 19.)

A Gravedigger's Plight

Some persons living near the Fort Hamilton Avenue gate to Greenwood Cemetery, Brooklyn, called at the near police station a few evenings ago and reported that they had heard moans coming from among the graves. While they were assuring the lieutenant of the truth of the account, the policeman on the post rushed in pale and haggard with a confirmatory story. The reserves were sent to investigate and found that the cries were those of a gravedigger, on whom the side of a newly-made grave had fallen. He was buried up to the neck and was badly hurt. He said that he had finished digging the grave about dusk, and had descended into it to level the floor when the side fell in. He fainted with pain at first, but when he recovered he had shouted for help as loudly as he could. He had heard several persons passing, but they had been scared and had hurried away. The police soon dug him out, but he had been a prisoner more than four hours in the grave. They sent him to the nearest hospital, where it was found that one of his legs was broken and he had sustained internal injuries, besides being half dead from cold and exposure. It was a ghastly experience for him, and he is doubtless deeply thankful that relief came in time to save his life. His occupation, however, must continually remind him that there is a time coming for him as for others, when the grave will finally close over him, and his dead body will be covered from the sight of men. Then even his exhumation would not restore him, as it has this time, but he must lie and mingle his ashes with the soil. But that need not depress him if he has put his trust in One who can save him, for then, supported by faith, he can say:

God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave; for he shall receive me. (Ps. 49: 15.)

A King's Gratitude

Search is now being made for an Englishman named Pendrell, who is entitled to a royal legacy. He is a descendant of a Staffordshire farmer, who, in 1651, saved from execution the Prince who afterward became King Charles II. The Prince fled after the battle of Worcester and found refuge with the farmer, who disguised him, and when the farm was being searched for him by Cromwell's soldiers, concealed him in a wide-spreading oak. Pendrell also helped him to reach the coast and thence to get to the Continent, when the search became less keen. When Charles returned in triumph, the farmer was not forgotten. He executed a grant, "under the great seale, of an annuity to ye Pendrells" and their descendants, in perpetuity, to the amount of $500 a year, which the sardonic King did not propose to pay himself, but ordered it to be raised by a tax on certain Cromwellian lands. It continued to be paid until 1859, when the Pendrell seventh in descent from "ye honest farmer" sold his life-interest in the annuity. Of course he could not sell the interest of his son, if he had one, and it is for this son that search is now being made. Thus a loyal act brought a reward not only to the man who performed it, but to his children and children's children to the seventh generation. Many a royalist must have wished that the opportunity had come to him, but at that time there was little prospect of its being rewarded. There are many Christians who wish they had been alive in Christ's time that they might have done him some personal service. They need not grieve that they did not have the opportunity, for he has chosen representatives in every generation and reckons service rendered to them as rendered to himself.

Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me. (Matt. 25: 40.)

An Insult to the Flag

A significant punishment was administered recently to a man in Hoboken, N. J., for an act of disrespect to the Stars and Stripes. He was returning from an entertainment in the early morning hours, when he noticed a large flag flying from a pole in a citizen's yard. In a spirit of mischief he opened his pocket knife and cut the halliards and the flag came fluttering to the ground. A policeman saw it fall and promptly arrested the man. When asked by the Recorder before whom he was arraigned, why he had done the mischief, he had nothing to say but that he objected to see the flag flying at that time in the morning. The Recorder answered that it was right to have that flag flying at any time, and he would pass a sentence that would teach the offender a lesson of respect. He ordered him to climb the forty-foot pole and replace the flag, and instructed two policemen to see that it was done. The news of the sentence attracted a crowd and the man was jeered as he clumsily climbed the pole and put the flag back. It is a curious fact that the man who cut the flag down was an American, but it was flying in the yard of a Frenchman, and the arrest was made by an Irish policeman, and the Recorder who pronounced sentence is said to be of English descent. Every one has a contempt for a man who lowers the symbol of his nation's honor. But it is too often forgotten that dishonorable conduct and unprincipled trickery do more to dishonor the nation to which a man belongs than any insult to his flag.

Ought ye not to walk in the fear of our God, because of the reproach of the heathen our enemies? (Neh. 5: 9.)

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Child in the Home

THE ideal home for a child is the home where a child has room to develop naturally. It is a home that does not bristle with don'ts. A mother was appalled one day when a visiting sister said: "I have jotted down the don'ts you have uttered to Emily to-day. You have said: 'Don't do that, Emily' eighty times since breakfast." Never is a home ideal when so full of ornamental bric-a-brac and fragile chairs and tables and delicate china and costly furniture that childish freedom therein is forever being curtailed, restrained and restricted.

If possible, the child's ideal home should be in the country. Out-of-doors in the air and sunlight, with stout shoes, with simple clothing, with plenty of space, children grow rosy-cheeked and sturdy. A brook where he may fish, a meadow where he may dream, a tree into which he may climb, furnish for the healthy child an earthly paradise.

A park is a quotation from the country, and affords to city children their best substitute for country freedom. Unhappily the ubiquitous blue-coated policeman is apt to be on hand when they are happiest, warning them from this or that forbidden spot.

When children have no playground except the pavement near their own home, they are not ideally situated for pleasure or health. Exercise in the open air, exercise pleasing to the mind as well as wholesome to the body, is a requisite indispensable to happy childhood.

The ideal home for the child is one where his mother is within call. Therefore, children who see their mothers only now and then, as sometimes is the way with the children of wealth and fashion, though nurses and teachers are ever so kind and wise, miss some precious things.

A home where the child helps the mother, where there are tools and spoons and basins and little brooms and dust-pans, is ideal. Dearly do children enjoy being in the midst of things and being of use.

Among recent writers, none excels J. M. Barrie in a sympathetic insight which reveals the inner heart and life of childhood. Grizel, the little heroine in Sentimental Tommy, had anything but an ideal home, yet the apology for a home that she had, gave her what many children lack, the chance to develop the mother-instinct that lies hidden deep in the soul of every young girl. She watched over her poor mother, "the Painted Lady," with more than maternal tenderness and with a sweetness that was half angelic, half pure womanly.

The child's home, to be ideal, must have in it some grown person who is a companion, confidante and friend, but who possesses no vested authority. This person may be a grandmother, may be an aunt, or merely a family friend. The fact of detachment from the family, so that she comes and goes, appears and disappears and reappears at intervals, is interesting to the child.

I remember a certain lady, who, as my mother's intimate friend, often spent long weeks at our home when I was a child of nine. She was a woman with no immediate ties. She had prim ways, wore her hair in waves, had dainty clothes, mostly of dove-color; I recall a changeable silk the color of a dove's wing. Our friend made wonderful pin-cushions and needle-books, knew how to knit and embroider, and when she was with us, kept the house merry with her gay repartees and droll stories. We children gleefully shouted when she came and cried when she went away. She had a funny little mincing step, and walked as if she were a mechanical toy just wound up. But among the memories of my own ideally serene childhood's home, her figure looms up, still dear. Shall I know her when next we meet on the shore of the crystal river, in the home where they go no more out?

There are rules in the child's ideal home, but they are few and sensible and easily understood. There are

Manners on the Road

WHAT about entering into conversation with strangers when I am taking a journey?" inquires a young woman who is a little uncertain as to her bearing when away from home without an escort.

It is a safe rule not to drift too soon or too easily into intimate talk with people one does not know when one is traveling, and is on the train or the steamboat for a few hours only. In a journey across the continent, or a voyage across the ocean, there is a greater opportunity to find out who of one's fellow travelers are to be trusted, and it is an unwise rule to preserve an attitude of suspicion, and to hold oneself aloof from pleasant intercourse during a number of successive days. Should one have to ask questions, favors or necessary information, go to an official person. The conductor on the train, the purser on the steamer or the stewards will tell whatever may be needful to guide an inexperienced traveler. If either man or woman attempts to be familiar on short acquaintance, asks personal questions or volunteers attentions that are needless, it is best to preserve a manner of perfect civility, but to discourage anything beyond mere politeness.

When going about in city conveyances, the young woman who happens to meet an acquaintance, does not allow him to pay her fare. That is the privilege only of a member of her family or a very intimate friend. One need never hesitate on her own part to offer a courtesy when traveling, if she sees a requisite occasion. Coming up from the South, on a three-days' journey, it happened once that the resources of the dining-car gave out completely.

The result was that a large number of passengers, entering the car in North Carolina, discovered that they must go supperless to bed. An elderly woman, leaning back in her corner, and feeling very faint, heard a sweet voice saying to her, "I happen to be prepared for this emergency, and have a larger luncheon than I need. I have traveled on this train before, and I always bring some supplies of my own. Won't you share a meal with me?"

A kindness like this may always be shown on the road, and may always be accepted with simple gratitude.

On another occasion, a traveler, observing that her neighbor was suffering from a headache, ventured to offer smelling salts and cologne, both of which were very rudely refused, either because the headache had made its victim cross, or because she feared to be under even a slight obligation to a stranger.

Whatever is declined should be declined graciously. It is always right to relieve a burdened mother by diverting, if one can, a weary child.

The truth of the matter is that the best manners in the world spring from kind hearts, and that on the road of life as we pass and re-pass, the small change of civility goes farther in diffusing happiness than the larger bills that symbolize the rugged virtues. There are times when ten cents in the purse is a greater convenience than a fifty-dollar bill.

ALL YOUNG TOGETHER

lessons in it and duties and things to do. The child in it is fearless and frank. He has never been cowed and oppressed by arbitrary and despotic control; he has been treated as if he had a desire to be right and brave, as indeed, if unspoiled, he has. It can hardly be ideal, if in it there are no playmates. It is not good for a child to be solitary.

Children should have live pets as well as toys and puppets. The friendly dog, comrade, playmate and chum, is an inseparable part of his little master's life, once the boy has known the joy of owning him. To refrain from cruelty to animals is the lowest step in the scale of refinement and humanity. Children should learn something of the goodness that springs from genuine love and understanding of domestic animals. A dog for the frolic and the road, a cat for the fireside, and the home approaches more nearly to completeness than without these pleasant companions. Those to whom a dog is merely a dog, a cat only a cat, have never entered into the joys that come from sharing one's cup and loaf with our animal friends.

WITH an attendance of over two hundred students, Taylor University, at Upland, Ind., is now entering upon the nineteenth year of its educational and spiritual work. Ever since its organization in 1890, it has been adding to its sphere of usefulness, until now the University has six departments, offering the student a wide field of selection, in which he may be prepared for any one of a number of vocations. Taylor University is a Christian university, in which the student of small means may be prepared for Christian work as a pastor, or as a missionary in either the home or foreign field. Thus it worthily maintains the intentions of its Christian founders, and keeps bright the memory of William Taylor, the consecrated Bishop of Africa, whose name it bears. Besides those who are studying for the ministry, there are a large number of students, both young men and women, who are preparing themselves for the profession of teaching. Others are fitting themselves for a business career.

The University has a most delightful and healthful situation at Upland. The land about is high and well drained and the scenery of the district, with its rolling fields and low hills, is one that strikes the eye of the tired city traveler as most pleasant and restful, and as an ideal spot for study. The attractions of a large university city, that so often distract the mind of the student from the real purpose of his stay at an educational institution, are wanting here, and those most interested in the welfare of the young men and women who come to Taylor for the spiritual culture and instruction it affords are rather glad of it. The student's entire attention is thus centred in his work, and he becomes a part of the University life. Warmer and more helpful friendships are formed among the students that endure long after they have gone out into the active duties of the world from the sheltering arms of their alma mater. The faculty can keep in closer touch with the social life of the student body, and the students themselves can get that broader culture that comes not only from the knowledge imparted during recitations and in lectures, but also from personal friendship with the professors themselves, something that cannot exist in institutions where the classes are so large as to absolutely preclude the professor knowing much of the personality of the young men and women who sit under his instruction.

In a way, the faculty and students strike the visitor at first as a large family, bound together in their effort to attain the common goal of Christian scholarship, and aiding one another greatly over the discouraging parts of the road, that are found by all at college.

The University is almost at the point marked as the present centre of population in the United States, and a glance at the University register shows that the students come from East and West, North and South, and a few even from foreign countries. Indiana, as it would be expected, furnishes the largest number. This in itself is a strong recommendation, showing that the greatest support comes from those who know it best and who realize that a good education may be obtained without going to other and far more expensive institutions of learning. The University comprises six schools: the College of Liberal Arts, the Academy, the Normal School, the School of Music, the School of Oratory and the Business College.

There are four courses offered in the College of Liberal Arts—the Classical Course, leading to the degree of Bachelor of Arts; the Scientific Course, leading to the degree of Bachelor of Science; the Literary Course, leading to the degree of Bachelor of Literature, and the Philosophical Course, leading to the degree of Bachelor of Philosophy. For young men preparing for the Christian ministry, a course in the College of Liberal Arts, if followed by study in the School of Theology, will be found of almost incalculable value. For those who are unprepared to take up the work of the freshman year at Taylor, an excellent preparatory department known as the Academy has been provided. In this way a thorough high school course may be obtained, the student passing easily and naturally to the first year's work of the College.

The School of Theology sends out every year a number of bright young men to take their places in the aggressive work of the Christian ministry. Taylor's graduates are noted for their untiring zeal and alertness in advancing the cause of Christ and have an inspiring record of work accomplished for the Master. In fact, the religious atmosphere of the entire University is most helpful. The study of the Bible is not relegated to the School of Theology alone, but finds a large place in the preparatory and collegiate departments. One of Taylor's mottoes is "Holiness Unto the Lord," and prayer and conference meetings are held every week of the school year for the purpose of advancing the students in the Christian life. The students all attend the Sunday services at some one of the Upland churches and they all assemble for public devotions. Among the active religious organizations are the Prayer Band, the Young Men's Holiness League, the Young Women's Holiness League, and the Volunteer Mission Band, devoted to fostering the missionary spirit among the students. Taylor has always shown a strong missionary zeal, and at present has representatives at work in South America, China, Porto Rico and Japan. Surely this is a record in which the University may well take a pardonable pride!

Probably no institution of equal grade offers so much to the prospective student at so little cost. The tuition is reasonable, and the expenses of living at the University are kept at a very low figure. Several opportunities are afforded students to pay a part of their expenses by work in the University buildings. Several prizes are offered. Dr. Klopsch, proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, gives THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Prize for excellency in debate between contestants chosen by the literary societies. He has always taken an active interest in Taylor University and at present is one of the Board of Trustees. Dr. Archibald, the acting president, is an educator and preacher of note.

Taylor may really be called the only Layman's University. It has the regular long course leading to the degree of Bachelor of Systematic Theology; but it has, in addition, shorter courses that fit ambitious young men and women for active Gospel work. The students with Taylor training are almost invariably successful in both the home and the foreign field. Forty-four are in the North Indiana Conference; others are distributed all over the United States. Any young man or woman who thinks of entering upon a life of Christian usefulness should write to President Archibald of the University, who will gladly give fuller information concerning this splendid institution, which has trained such an army of valiant soul-winners in the past.

MISS STONE'S ABDUCTOR DEAD

A CABLE dispatch announces the death by assassination of Boris Sarafoff, the Macedonian revolutionary chieftain. He was shot down in cold blood by a brother revolutionist at his own doorstep.

Sarafoff was the brigand leader who, in 1901, boldly plotted and skilfully carried out the scheme for the abduction of Miss Ellen M. Stone, the American Board missionary. With Mme. Tsilka, the wife of a local preacher, the missionary was seized near Salonica and held a captive by Sarafoff's band for several weeks in a cave in a wild mountainous region, while Turkish troops searched for her everywhere in vain. Threats that unless the sum of twenty-five thousand Turkish pounds (equal to $110,000) was paid to the abductors as a ransom, the missionary's life would be sacrificed, produced the desired result.

Boris Sarafoff

Friends and sympathizers in this country raised a large sum, which was paid over to secure the release of Miss Stone. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD aided in this work and shared the general joy when the missionary, after weeks of peril, was at last delivered safe and sound by the brigands to the care of friends at Monastir.

Sarafoff has been variously designated as "patriot," "demagogue," "hero," "filibuster," "emancipator," "cowardly agitator," and "brigand assassin." He was undoubtedly a composite, in whom all these apparently conflicting qualities had a place. That his methods were often dark and criminally brutal, is admitted by his friends. But it is urged in his behalf that he could not have been otherwise. Born of revolutionary stock in the little Turkish village of Ljabjechro, he was early a witness of many Turkish atrocities. When only a lad in the Salonica gymnasium, he saw his own father and grandfather dragged about the city in chains, surrounded by Turkish zaptiehs, and accused, with other Christians, of fomenting rebellion against Turkish control. The child tried to break his way through the cordon, but was mocked at by horsemen and belabored with whips. The boy gathered up stones and pelted the sentry, who called out the guard, and the youthful rebel was arrested. He afterward saw his relatives carried into exile, and he vowed that the Turks should pay dearly for their sufferings and for all the horrors of which he had been a witness. His life thereafter was apparently devoted to plans of revenge. When he was about eighteen years old he became a soldier in the Bulgarian army, and after several years of military experience, he took up the cause of Macedonian freedom. Collecting a band of young men, he drilled them, crossed the Turkish frontier and attacked the town of Melnik, cutting the telegraph wires, burning the prefecture, overpowering the guard and releasing all prisoners.

This, however, was only the beginning of his spectacular career, which included over 400 raids into Turkish territory. A price of 100,000 francs was set on his head, but he had so many escapes that the peasants declared he possessed a "charmed life." He afterward visited Paris, Rome and London, and formed Macedonian revolutionary committees. A frequent cause of dissension was the apportionment of the money subscribed to the Macedonian cause; the same dissension which ultimately ended in his assassination.

DAYS OF PERSECUTION IN SALVADOR

WHILE visiting San Pedro, one of our out-stations some fifty-six miles east of headquarters, recently, our lives were threatened and every possible effort was made to break up our meetings. During two services a company of forty or more attacked us, throwing stones and dirt, shouting, "Death to the Protestants! Away with them!" etc. We quietly continued the services until they retired of their own accord. The same evening I notified the Governor and United States Minister, through whom orders were given to the local authorities to protect us; but instead, we were threatened worse than ever. As our time had expired, we left for the capital the following day. But the judge, hearing of the uproar, made inquiry and had all the principal Romanists and Protestants summoned to testify to what they knew. The outcome of the trial was that the priest of the town, who had been the instigator of the trouble, was found guilty and sentenced to three years' imprisonment. The Bishop, knowing of the case, had him transferred to another part of the Republic. Thus the terror of San Pedro was removed, and now the believers are able to hold their meetings in peace. I have just returned from another visit to that place, and things are very different. Instead of assaults and threats, six policemen are detailed every night to protect our meetings. At another town which was under the care of the same priest, we had meetings with as many as 125 in attendance, and many accepted Christ.

At one of our newly opened stations, the authorities, through the priest, prohibited our native worker from holding services; but the priest was removed and the Governor gave special protection to our worker. In all of this we are more and more conscious that the work is of God.

Having been thwarted in their attacks at two of our out-stations, the enemy attempted an attack here at headquarters in San Salvador City. A pamphlet was published which pretended to expose the errors of Protestantism by the Bible, and which denounced Protestants. This was widely circulated, but it did no serious harm to the work. The only serious outcome was that the agent of our chapel, in order to drive us out, raised the rent. He knew that our church was composed tions. What we really need is a building of our own, in order that the work may proceed unmolested. Such a building could be had for about $10,000.

This country at present is passing through a financial crisis on account of almost incessant war for over a year, and with the writer as teacher. This was the first Bible Institute in the Republic of Salvador.

We greatly appreciate the interest of your readers and thank them all for co-operation in the past.

Pastor Bender, the Missionary Instructor, is seated in the centre of poor people. The consequence is that we will either have to pay or leave, which latter would mean closing the work at headquarters, because it is next to impossible to get a house in a good location at reasonable rent. We are very reluctant to give up this centre, because it would have a tendency to weaken our out-sta-

the constant fear of revolution. Still, despite all drawbacks, our work is growing throughout the Salvadorean Republic. We are arranging to train some natives as evangelists and pastors, and a mission house would be a necessity for this purpose. We lately called some twelve natives together for study and preparation,

Is There Life on Mars?

M. Camille Flammarion, the celebrated French astronomer, writes this "latest word" on the problem of Martian life:

Life, as we understand it, would be impossible on certain planets, such as Jupiter, which are yet comparatively young and in process of formation; but such life could quite well exist on Mars, though we do not know what sort of life it is. Possibly periodical floods have caused the Martians to become amphibious, or they may be able to fly just as easily as we walk. Bearing in mind that Mars is much older than the earth, I believe the red planet to be inhabited by a race of beings intellectually superior to ourselves. They could hardly be less intelligent than we are, seeing that we spend three-fourths of our resources in keeping up armies and navies wherewith to kill one another, and that we cannot even agree upon a universal calendar or a universal meridian. There is nothing at all impossible in the supposition that such a race constructed the tremendous system of waterways revealed to us by our telescopes and photographic lenses. Possibly the Martians tried to communicate with us hundreds of thousands of years ago, when mammoths roamed at will over our continents and man had not made his appearance. They may have tried again later, and given up the attempt to attract the attention of a planet which they supposed to be either uninhabited, or peopled by a race of beings quite indifferent to the study of the universe or the search after eternal truth.

Will Give Sunshine All the Year

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Please receive thanks for so prompt reply in sending "Twice Around the World with Alexander, Prince of Gospel Singers" and your sweet Calendar. It will give "sunshine all the year," and the book will be a continual inspiration to believe that all the "promises of God are yea and amen in his dear Son."

IN due time, Hollis went away, looking so bright, so happy, so pretty, in her new traveling suit, that the minister said good-by to her with a regret so genuine that it brought the gratified blushes to her cheeks while triumph filled her heart.

Glenn Fraser was at the station when Hollis reached there.

"Hello," he said. "Eloping?"

"Not exactly," she replied gaily. "I am going to a wedding, though, which is next thing to your guess."

"Do not be one of the foolish virgins," he said, in his teasing fashion.

"No, indeed! You'll never catch me napping when there is a chance to have a good time."

"Or to have a view of a bridegroom," he added. "It's a pity you can't find one for yourself without going outside of Hawthorne to see one belonging to another girl. I'll take care of the preacher, while you are gone. I guess I can manage to keep him in hot water. I'll do my best, anyway, and you can double the doses on your return, if you think I have not done my full duty by him."

Hollis was in too good a humor to allow his satire to trouble her.

"You'll soon get yourself shut up in an insane asylum, if you keep on making such silly remarks," she answered him. "How much will you give me to bring you a bit of the bride's cake to dream on?"

"Nothing, thank you! I have troubles enough without having the fore-shadowings of greater ones in my dreams," he replied, as picking up her suitcase he attended her to the steps of her car.

"How long will you be away?" he asked at the last moment.

"Not less than three weeks. More probably four. Good-by," and she was gone.

"Did ever better luck happen to Hawthorne?" he exclaimed to himself as he went up the street. "Now if some other turn of good luck would only take Mr. Allan clear out of the Hayward house for a month, there would be a chance of his shaking himself free of evil influences."

His wish was answered sooner than he had reason to hope. The very next day, Mrs. Hayward received a message calling her and her husband to the bedside of a brother who was dangerously ill. She began hurried preparations for their journey, but paused in dismay over the thought of their guest.

"What shall we do about Mr. Allan?" she asked. The minister heard her, and promptly appeared at the sitting-room door.

"Do not worry about me for one moment, Mrs. Hayward. I will stay here and look after the house, and I have no doubt that I can persuade some of the good neighbors to give me a meal now and then."

"The very thing," she cried in relief. "I would hate to leave the house with no one to take care of it. I have no doubt Miss Tilly Walker will be glad to entertain you. She has no one but her brother to do for, and she is a first-class cook. More than that, she will be glad to add a little to her income, for she is very poor. I can leave you safely in her care—only look out for her tongue. She is a notorious busy-body."

"I'll risk that part," he replied more gaily than he felt. He was weary of busy-bodies and spiteful gossip, of which he had experienced so much of late. He found himself wishing that the Lawrence home was not so far away, or that he might leave his post of duty as caretaker of his present home, and take refuge in that haven of rest and enjoyment.

The arrangement with Miss Walker forty Aunt Tilly Walkers. She is such a blessed old busy-body," he said.

Mr. Allan found the new arrangement very much to his liking. After the first meal with Miss Walker and her brother, his spirits rose. Her cooking was fine—that much was certain—and her conversation, although abundant, had been agreeable and kindly.

He went back to his studies feeling that the world was very bright, and life very well worth living.

"If this continues long," he said to himself as he lounged comfortably in a

Aunt Tilly Walker across the street, hearing both invitation and answer, nodded and smiled approvingly.

"Glenn must have been getting in some more of his good work," she commented to herself. "He's a blessed busy-body, when he chooses to be," she added, using the very same term he had applied to herself.

At breakfast the next morning, she led the young man to talk of his call of the previous evening, and before he realized it, he had repeated much of the merry repartee that had passed between Charlie Lester and Mabel Lawrence. The good woman laughed heartily.

"They are a gay pair," she said as she wiped her eyes. "I'm glad they have made up again. They used to think a sight of one another, but somebody made trouble between 'em, and like to have broke 'em up for good and all. It's a genuine providence that has brought 'em together again, an' I hope that some day you'll be the providence that will tie the knot between 'em good and tight. Them Lawrence girls are ornaments to the community, and more than that, they make themselves useful, too. Most everybody likes both of 'em, but Kathleen's the favorite everywhere. She's worth her weight in gold, that girl is."

Mr. Allan thought about her words when he had returned to his study.

"How kindly she speaks of every one!" he said to himself. "I have not heard one word against any one, although Mrs. Hayward warned me that she has a gossiping tongue. So far, she has proved to be a golden gossip. I wonder who it was that made trouble between Charlie and Miss Mabel. He was quite attentive to Hollis when I came here. Surely she did not make the trouble. It is wrong to even think such a thing of her."

"What a lovely girl Miss Kathleen is! Miss Walker spoke truly when she said she was worth her weight in gold. She certainly is worth that to the young people of Hawthorne church. I cannot understand how the Haywards have formed such a misconception of her, for every one else seems to think so highly of her. Charlie Lester ought to know her character as well as any one, and he is enthusiastic over her. I must try and convince Hollis that she has a mistaken opinion of the Lawrence girls. The three might be such good friends, and such a help to the church, if I could get them together. They certainly have never had any difficulty, for Kathleen always speaks so kindly of her. Some one has been telling Hollis untrue stories, I am sure."

"I wonder whether the folks will take the trouble to write to me while they are away. Hollis will doubtless be too busy to spare a thought to me, but Mr. Hayward will surely drop me a line. I must write to them to stay for a good visit while they are there, and tell them not to hurry home on my account. I am having the finest kind of a time, and do not need them here at all—so far as my personal comfort is concerned."

Then he sat down to his desk, at peace with himself and all mankind, and quite unconscious of the fact that his thoughts and feelings were an indication of the influence exercised over him by those whose absence he did not deplore.

"'I'm going to a wedding,' replied Hollis gaily" was made, and with minds freed from home cares, Mr. and Mrs. Hayward started upon their unexpected journey. The news of their departure soon spread through the little town, and in course of time reached Glenn Fraser's ears.

"Hooray!" he cried, tossing his cap into the air. "I don't rejoice in anybody's misery, but I glory in their absence—sometimes. Guess I'll go down and make Aunt Tilly Walker a call. She surely is equal to the emergency, but it will just do my soul good to assure myself of the fact," and away he went. A half-hour later he walked gaily up the street.

"It's a pity that Hawthorne hasn't hammock on the Hayward piazza—"if this continues, I fear I will not be properly glad to see 'my folks' come home."

The quiet of his surroundings made study a delight, and the hours passed swiftly. It was not until twilight fell that he found the silence at all oppressive, but almost before he realized that he was lonely, Charlie Lester drove up to the gate.

"I'm going over to Mr. Lawrence's," he called. "Don't you want to keep me company?"

"Indeed I do," was the hearty response. "Wait a minute until I make myself more presentable."

THE CHANGED HEART AND LIFE

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

THE Oriental house of the better type had a guest room, and it was always located upon one corner of the roof, and was approached by an outside stairway. It was such a room as this that the woman of Shunem desired to build for the prophet Elisha, when she said to her husband: "Let us make a little chamber, I pray thee, on the wall; and let us set up for him there a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick, and it shall be when he cometh to us, that he shall turn in thither." Again and again the prophet Elisha did occupy that room as he had occasion to pass through Shunem, and from this circumstance, the name "prophet's chamber" is often applied to a guest room.

Jesus, who had no place of his own where he might lay his head, was not infrequently invited to occupy the "prophet's chamber" in the homes of his friends. It was when he was in one of these, that Nicodemus came by night to see him. We see Jesus in the dim light afforded by the Oriental lamp, a tiny wick floating upon oil and salt, rise to meet his guest. Is Jesus surprised when he recognizes Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews? Jesus was not indeed accustomed to being sought out by that class of men, but he was too true a gentleman to express either in word or manner any surprise there might be in his own mind. Nicodemus told Jesus that he had become convinced that he was "a teacher sent from God," and referred to the miracles that Jesus had done, and testified that God must be in him who could do them.

The Condition

Nicodemus was in the room with Christ, but as yet he was not in his kingdom. Jesus desired that he should be, and there was only one way by which he could belong to it. And so Jesus said to Nicodemus: "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." But Nicodemus thought only of how a little child is born, and he said to Jesus: "It is not possible for one who has grown to be a man to be born again." "But there is another kind of birth," said Jesus; "it is to be born of the Spirit of God." But still Nicodemus did not understand Jesus, and he asked the question, "How can these things be?" Jesus was quite sure that Nicodemus, from the time he was a little boy, had heard the story of how Moses had, according to the command of God, made a serpent of brass, so that the people who were dying from the bites of fiery serpents might be healed if only they would look upon the brazen serpent which Moses had placed upon a pole. Jesus reminded him of it and explained to him how God thus be born again, created anew by the Holy Spirit.

We do not read in the Bible that Nicodemus ever came again to visit Jesus, and it is to be feared that for a while he was not brave enough to "believe and receive and confess him" at the risk of losing his high place in the Jewish church. But at last, in the most critical hour, when Jesus had been crucified and was about to be placed in the tomb, he brought a large gift for his embalming—one hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes. It reminds us of the flowers sometimes heaped the higher on a coffin because the giver had not been altogether loyal to the one who had passed beyond the opportunity of his apology or repentance. Let us hope this brave confession of friendship for Christ, at a time when it involved a risk of life itself, be-should not perish, but have everlasting life." "Oh, Mary, is that there?" "Yes, father, but hear the rest of it: 'For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.'" "Oh, that is for me, a poor sinner like me. 'Whosoever believeth in him.' I can believe in him—I do believe in him;" and from that night Mary's father became a Christian.

Salvation from Above

"God so loved the world." This text has been called "the Bible in miniature." The first word is "God." Salvation begins with God. The trouble with most attempts at salvation is that they begin with the man himself, with "try" instead of trust. Man says, "What shall I do?" God re-

"The love of God that is shed abroad" in hearts truly converted is not love for God, altogether lovely, but love like God's for the unlovely souls of men to the ends of the earth, a love that makes a human heart like the ocean reaching out helpfully to all shores. This text has expressed God's love in all parts of the world. Turn to the untutored minds of the negroes of South Africa. Round the missionary they gather, with outstretched hands and pleading gestures. They come to ask for the Bible. They do not know even its name. They know but little of its Author. They have only heard a very few of its words. And yet this is their request: "Give us the book with the beautiful words, 'God so loved the world,' and he gives it, eagerly, willingly, freely."

"That he gave his only begotten Son." "Since I have become a father," said a man to Bishop Thomson, "I am beginning to understand better how great was that love for man that prompted God to deliver up an only Son to death."

"That whosoever believeth." An evangelist tells this story: At the close of one of my Gospel preachings, a young woman came to me in deep soul trouble, inquiring the way of salvation. After a little conversation, in which I found that the Spirit of God had deeply convicted her of sin, I took her Bible, and turning to John 3: 16, asked her to read it. She did so, and read: "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Applying a Text

I then said to her, "Go home to your room, and in the presence of God, alone with himself, go down upon your knees and turn to this verse; and instead of the word 'world,' and the word 'whosoever,' just put your name in each place, and see how it will fit you." The following week, at the close of the meeting, she came to me with a beaming face, and said, "I want to tell you, sir, that I am saved now." "Thank God!" I replied; "when did that take place?" "Last Sunday evening, sir," she said. "I went home and read the verse you told me, and put my name in, and it just fitted me, and I thank God for it."

"Might not perish." A Christian worker tells this story: "I remember going into a certain prison where I found

A Young Girl

As I approached her she said: 'Don't say anything to me about sin! I can tell you more about sin' and all its bitter results in two minutes than you would tell me in a day.' I said, 'Oh, I know you could; but you can't tell me anything about the love of God. God loves you.' And I quoted over and over again John 3:16. The next time I saw her was on her dying bed in a hospital. As soon as she recognized me she lisped out just four words: 'Loved; gave; believeth; everlasting life!' I was afraid she didn't fully understand, because she had left out one word I was anxious to hear her say, so I wrote 'whosoever' on a sheet of paper and held it up before her eyes. She didn't speak it, but with her fingers she pointed to herself, and a few moments later she passed into eternity."

Handsomest Bible He Ever Bought

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I received the new Red Letter Bible in perfect condition, and I must say it is without exception the finest and very best premium you have ever given or could possibly give. It is the handsomest Bible I ever bought and the equal of any $10 Bible I ever saw. I was so delighted when I saw it that I could not wait until Christmas to give it to my daughter, but gave it at once. I pray that you may be the recipient of God's richest blessings.

tokens that the midnight lesson on conversion had not only been remembered, but had been incorporated in his very life.

The Mosaic Symbol

"As Moses lifted up the serpent . . . even so must the Son of man be lifted up." In a Western town there was a Roman Catholic family consisting of the father and mother and a little girl named Mary, about twelve years old. There was no Catholic church within reach, so Mary was allowed to go to a Protestant Sunday School. The father of the family was taken very sick. Thinking he was going to die, he became very much troubled about his sins. One night he awoke, and was in such great distress that he begged his wife to pray for him. She said she had never prayed for herself, and didn't know how to pray. "Perhaps," said his wife, "our little Mary can pray; for she has been going to the Sunday School a good while." "Go and call her at once," he said. Mary was brought. "Mary, my child, can you pray?" asked her father, with great earnestness. "Oh, yes, father, I can," she said. "Will you pray for your father?" So she kneeled down, and, putting up her hands, she said, "Our Father, which art in heaven," going through the Lord's prayer. Then she asked God to have mercy on her father, to pardon his sins and teach him to love Jesus, and to make him well again for Jesus' sake. When she had finished her father said, "Mary, will you read me some from the Bible?" Then she got her Bible, and began to read the third chapter of John. She read on till she came to these words: "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth on him

plies, 'Behold what I have done for you.' "Do your gods love you?" asked a missionary of some Indians. "The gods never think of loving," was the cheerless answer. The missionary repeated the sixteenth verse of the third chapter of John's Gospel: "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." "Read it again," asked the arrested pagan. "That is large light—read it again." A third time the blessed words were repeated, and with this emphatic response: "That is true; I feel it."

Bishop Butler, author of the famous Analogy, was on his deathbed. As often happens to eminent Christians in the dying hour, the learned and pious bishop was distressed by doubts. His chaplain was with him and tried to encourage him. "I feel that I am a great sinner," said the bishop. "The blood of Jesus cleanseth us from all sin," echoes the comforting answer.

"True! true!" A smile is on the white face. "Jesus will receive—but—God the Father—?"

A Bishop Comforted

"God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." From the majestic intellect and massive brow of the author of the Analogy and of those "deep and wondrous sermons preached in his great chapel" rolls away the last cloud of distress and distrust. Raising the hand which had so often written for others, he said, exultingly, "Though I have read that Scripture a thousand times over, I never felt its virtue as at this moment. Now—now—I die happy."

J. B., Bethlehem, Pa. Is the Jewish Mayor of Rome a native of Italy?

Ernest Nathan, the newly elected Mayor of Rome, was born in England and educated at Oxford. He comes of one of the oldest Jewish families. He is an ardent Italian, though foreign born, and is extremely popular. It is believed that he will give the city a clean and satisfactory administration.

M. D. K., Plymouth, Mass. 1. What books are alluded to in the Bible that we do not now possess? 2. What is the story of Uter and Pendragon and where can I find it?

1. There are nine such books: The book of the wars of the Lord, mentioned in Num. 21: 14; the book of Jasher, Josh. 10: 13; the book of Nathan and the book of Gad, I. Chron. 29: 29; the book of Ahijah and the book of Iddo, II. Chron. 9: 29; the book of Shemaiah, II. Chron. 12: 15; the book of Jehu, II. Chron. 20: 34; the prophecy of Enoch, Jude 14. Probably some of these were not books, but mere records, from which the Bible writers extracted incidents. 2. The story is related by an old writer (Geoffrey of Monmouth), in his Historia Regum Britannia, which deals with the Arthurian legends. A recent book on the subject, entitled A Story of the Origin of Arthurian Romance, can be ordered through any bookseller.

Jennie de V., Detroit, Mich. With respect to the missionary substitute plan, our circle here is divided in opinion, some holding that India is the neediest field; others Japan, China, etc. Which is the largest and neediest in a Gospel sense, at the present moment?

All things considered, China is unquestionably the field upon which the energies of the Christian Church should now be centered. If you glance at these figures you will more readily understand the magnitude of the problem:

Population of China proper according to last census	407,000,000
Population of Japan, 43,000,000
Great Britain . . . 37,000,000
Italy . . . 32,000,000
United States . . . 80,000,000
European Russia . . . 94,000,000
Spain and Portugal . . . 23,000,000
France and Colonies 47,000,000
Canada, Norway and Sweden . . . 13,000,000
China's excess of population over other countries named	38,000,000

C. L. W., Mercer, W. Va. 1. What was the difference between the length of a day's journey and of a Sabbath day's journey? 2. Where was Jesus baptized?

1. The usual measure of a day's journey among the ancient Jews was about twenty miles, but it was not regarded as an exact measure. A Sabbath day's journey was two thousand paces or ells, but there were ingenious ways of increasing it if necessary, as by making a halt on the way and taking a meal, thus making the halting place a temporary home. 2. There is no record, but probably at the fords of the Jordan, northeast of Jericho, in the land of Benjamin.

B. D., Germantown, Pa. What is the Nobel Prize, and how is it awarded?

Alfred Nobel, a Scandinavian who made a large fortune by the manufacture of dynamite, on his death a few years ago left the greater part of his wealth to be distributed in prizes, five in all, to be awarded each year to the persons who within that year had rendered the greatest service in the fields of physics, chemistry, medicine, idealistic literature, and peace.

A. R. C., Bancroft, Ia. What did Christ intend to teach by his advice (Matt. 5: 25, 26) to agree with the adversary?

It was a counsel of peace and the avoidance of litigation. Christ would have his followers peaceable and willing to suffer rather than fight. It is in harmony with other parts of this discourse. (See verse 40.) The cloak is to go rather than contend for the coat. So he advises a man on the way to court to yield rather than proceed to judgment. Many a man who has lost his estate in legal expenses in a struggle that might have been settled privately, has had occasion to wish he had followed Christ's advice. The same principle applies to quarrels among church members. "Go and be reconciled to thy brother" before you approach God by prayer and offerings.

An Old Subscriber, Dallas, Tex. Will you give some information about the Carnegie Hero Fund for meritorious acts?

Andrew Carnegie, in April, 1904, established a fund of $5,000,000 for the benefit of the dependents of those losing their lives in the effort to save their fellow men, or for the heroes themselves if injured only. Provision was made for medals for meritorious acts. Mr. Carnegie ordered that "For exceptional children, exceptional grants may be made for exceptional education. Grants of sums of money may

We can set no limits to the mercy of God, but a man takes an awful and unnecessary risk when he postpones repentance until after death. We do not say there is no possibility of redemption in the other world, but there is no ground for hope of it given in God's Word.

N. M. A., Moravia, Ia. 1. Where was "Franklin State"? 2. Where is the key to the Bastille?

1. It was called "Franklin" or "Frankland." The people of East Tennessee met at Jonesboro in 1784 to form an independent State; they had formerly been under the jurisdiction of North Carolina. A second convention organized a government on the plan of North Carolina, and called the new State "Frankland." North Carolina protested. The new State government maintained a quasi existence, though torn with dissensions, until 1788, when Governor Sevier was compelled to flee, and the State of "Frankland" went out of existence, and the authority of North Carolina was re-established. Later, Sevier became first governor of Tennessee. 2. The key of the Bastille was sent by Lafayette to Washington at Mount Vernon. It may be in the collection of relics now preserved there. We are unable to answer the two other questions sent.

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Your premium, "Five Hundred Animal Stories," arrived O. K., and I want to congratulate you upon the value of the same. I ordered it for the children, but find it a condensed treasure house full of suggestive matter intensely interesting to myself. It's the best premium I ever received with any publication.

The Shrines of Isaac, Jacob and Joseph in Machpelah

THERE is little significance in the fact that the first use to which we read in the Bible of money being applied was the purchase of a grave. The story is told in Genesis 23. Abraham, bereaved of his wife, desires a burying-place where she may be laid. He was dwelling at the time among "the children of Heth," who cordially responded to his pathetic request by offering him his choice of their sepulchres. But he will not accept their generous offer. He wants to own the place where the sacred ashes shall lie. Finally he purchased the cave of Machpelah from Ephron the Hittite for four hundred shekels of silver (estimated at $300), and he weighed it "in current money," and paid it to Ephron. The land and the cave remained a permanent possession and became a burying-place for the patriarchs. Abraham was laid there beside his wife Sarah, and there Isaac and Rebekah were buried, and when Jacob died in Egypt he was carried to Machpelah and buried there with his fathers. The cave with its venerated contents is now in the possession of the Turks, who have sealed it up and will allow no one to enter it. A mosque is built above it, and in it are shrines, supposed to stand directly over the places where the bodies are respectively laid in the cave below. Curiously they have a shrine for Joseph, who was not buried there (see Joshua 24: 32), but in the inheritance of his children. The shrines are covered by richly embroidered cloths.

J. B., Nooksack, Wash. From what did Halloween originate?

Hallowe'en is the name popularly given to the eve or vigil of All Hallows or festival of All Saints. In Roman Catholic countries it has long been observed with religious ceremonies. In England and Scotland, a great many harmless revelries grew up in connection with Hallowe'en that have been transplanted to this country.

C. V. K., Hope, Ind. Is there any hope that one who dies in sin and impenitent will be redeemed in the future world?

There is no such hope held out in the Bible, and that is the only authority we can recognize on the subject. Perhaps if such a hope had been given, more people would have postponed repentance than do so now. The Bible is our guide for this vorite title, "Son of Man." The writer of Hebrews also refers to him as being made like unto "his brethren" (Heb. 2: 17). 2. Neither is there any passage directly calling him the Great Physician, but no one on earth was so well entitled to the title. 3. We know no more than others, of the conditions of life in heaven. We are taught, however, to think of God as a Being of infinite wisdom, and therefore do not for a moment imagine that he would keep children in an undeveloped condition throughout eternity.

A Christian Life Closed

A VENERABLE and widely respected Christian worker, Mr. Charles Edwards, passed away at his home in Newark, N. J., recently, at the ripe age of seventy-eight years. Mr. Edwards was born in Worcester, England, and came to the United States sixty-five years ago. He learned the wood-turning trade, and in the sixties started in business for himself in Newark. After many years of successful business life he retired, and devoted himself to Christian work.

Over forty years ago Mr. Edwards established a regular Monday night prayer meeting at his home, which resulted in doing much good. He taught a Bible class of young men in the Clinton Street M. E. Church, and was a class-leader in the Halsey Street M. E. Church for a number of years. He was also an active member of the Newark Tract Society. He always carried tracts with him and distributed them as he walked along, talking to people on the subject of religion. He took an active part in church work and in visiting the sick and afflicted, and in leading sinners to Christ. He was a member of the Newark Praying Band, which went to all parts of New Jersey to help country churches.

Mr. Edwards was for many years a canvasser for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and was most successful in securing subscribers. His wife died seven years ago. He is survived by one son and one daughter, two grandchildren and three great-grandchildren. His whole life was a notable example of practical Christianity, and he was beloved by all who knew him. New Home for Working Girls

A new Home for Working Girls has been opened at 239 East Thirty-second Street, New York City. There is no fixed age limit. The object is to provide a home where working girls earning not more than ten dollars a week can find room and board within their means. The Home is Christian but non-sectarian, and any working girl with suitable references may apply for admission. Mrs. Emma Stone is the house-mother. She plans for frequent social evening gatherings and to make the home life as agreeable and helpful as possible. The Home is to be maintained by the Epworth Leagues of the New York District. The movement grew out of a realizing sense of the moral perils that confront working girls who receive less than ten dollars per week. At the Young Woman's Christian Association of New York it was said: "Fifty such homes could be filled almost immediately."

SUSANNA COCROFT'S NEW BOOKS

GROWTH IN SILENCE, Ideals and Privileges of Woman, and Character as Expressed in the Body, are the attractive titles of three new books by Susanna Cocroft, the well-known authority on physical culture. These books have been aptly described as the "crystallized thought of a woman who believes that a woman's destiny rests largely in her own hands." No work has heretofore been published (except the text-book Physiology) which gives so intelligent a scientific knowledge of the mechanism and workings of the human body. The vital functions are not only explained in these lectures, but all are illustrated by colored plates. Miss Cocroft believes that all the qualities that make a woman well, wholesome, magnetic and attractive are hers, if she uses the intelligence given to her. These books are the clearest, most complete handling of the subjects which pertain to the health of woman and the happiness of home. It is Miss Cocroft's desire that the influence of her work be extended as widely as possible, for the general uplifting of womanhood, and to this end the entire series of twelve books, bound separately in pure white, cream and brown, heavy art, deckle edge paper, are sold for the nominal subscription price of $4.

She teaches the philosophy of perfect mental and physical equipoise; of the true view of life; of the conquest over one's self; of the highest ideals and how to attain them; of personal purity, and a sweet and refined nature. She speaks clearly and wisely on such topics as unhygienic dress, the disregard of small things, neatness of one's appearance, how to retain good health, the duty of woman in the home, woman's participation in business life, etc. A most interesting subject which she discusses is the reading of character through bodily expression, as shown in the pose of the body, the arms, the manner of wearing the dress, etc.

The three books mentioned above are published by the Physical Culture Extension Society, 57 Washington Street, Chicago. Price 40 cents each.

A PHARISEE'S QUESTION

By Mrs. M. BAXTER

COMING to Jesus as an inquirer, Nicodemus needed the cover of night, lest his compeers should discover that he, who professed to know so much, was willing to admit his ignorance and learn of One whom they despised. His first words to Jesus were, "Rabbi, we know." Jesus took Nicodemus out of his depth and immediately showed him what he did not know. Nicodemus, judging Jesus by what he saw, said, "We know that thou art a teacher come from God." Jesus' answer was, "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again he cannot enter the kingdom of God."

This is the word which Jesus speaks to every human soul. "I say unto thee, except thou be born again, thou canst not see the kingdom of God." It is not simply that we cannot enter the kingdom. We have no power so much as to perceive there is a kingdom of God until we ourselves have to do with it. A man born blind can have no conception of what it is to see, nor a man born deaf of what it is to hear, and equally, the unspiritual man, the man not yet born again, cannot conceive what spiritual life is. Nicodemus very naturally added, "How can a man be born when he is old?" All his ideas were from the standpoint which he occupied. He was of the earth, earthy, and nothing spiritual had as yet developed in him. He could reason, but he could not perceive spiritual things.

"Born again" is, in the Greek, "born from above," and the Spirit of God is from above. By the Word, quickened by the Spirit of God, spiritual life enters into man; a life which is not of human origin. "As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name; which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God" (John 1:12, 13). "That which is born of the Spirit is spirit." It is this which the natural man cannot comprehend. He can reason, he can argue, he can aspire, he can pray, but all this is on the human plane. He needs to have within him something of God himself, in order to understand God. The spiritual world is utterly distinct from the natural world, as much so as the animal kingdom is distinct from the vegetable kingdom. If Nicodemus would receive Christ and believe on his name and yield himself up to him, then Nicodemus would receive life from above and become spiritual; otherwise he would remain without the new birth, without the spiritual life.

Jesus continued, "Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born from above. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof [there is evidence of its presence; no one can possibly doubt that the wind is there], but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit." No human eye can see the incoming of the Spirit of God, no human perception, however keen, can mark whence he cometh and whither he goeth, and yet the presence of the Spirit of God in any man is as manifest as the sun in the sky, or the daylight upon the earth. None who know God's Spirit can fail to perceive when spiritual life has entered into another. He recognizes something which he himself has known and experienced.

Music Lessons Free

IN YOUR OWN HOME.

A wonderful offer to every lover of music, whether a beginner or an advanced player.

Ninety-six lessons (or a less number if you desire) for either Piano, Organ, Violin, Guitar, Banjo, Cornet, Sight Singing or Mandolin will be given free to make our home study courses for these instruments known in your locality. You will get one lesson weekly, and your only expense during the time you take the lessons will be the cost of postage and the music you use, which is small. Write at once. It will mean much to you to get our free booklet. It will place you under no obligation whatever to us if you never write again. You and your friends should know of this work. Hundreds of our pupils write: "Wish I had known of your school before." "Have learned more in one term in my home with your weekly lessons than in three terms with private teachers, and at a great deal less expense." "Everything is so thorough and complete." "The lessons are marvels of simplicity, and my 11-year-old boy has not had the least trouble to learn." One minister writes: "As each succeeding lesson comes I am more and more fully persuaded I made no mistake in becoming your pupil."

We have been established nine years—have thousands of pupils from eight years of age to seventy. Don't say you cannot learn music till you send for our free booklet and tuition offer. It will be sent by return mail free. Address U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC, Box 7—225 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

REVIVED AT LAST

Emaciated Woman Restored By Proper Food.

The amount of harm done from eating food which lacks the nourishing elements or is in such form that the system can't absorb it, is much greater than many persons even suspect.

The harm can't be corrected by drugs either. There must be a complete change in the dietary—the cause of the trouble must be removed.

"I have been a constant sufferer from stomach trouble, constipation and neuralgia for the past 14 years," writes a Mich. lady, "and the past year became tired of life, of everybody and everything."

"The best doctors and several weeks at a Sanitarium afforded me only temporary relief. Finally an attack of the grippe caused me to give up hope of ever being well again. I was growing weaker and more emaciated every day."

"At last a doctor advised me to try some predigested food, as nothing would stay on my stomach. My husband sent for some Grape-Nuts, of which I ate a little with milk, and then awaited the usual results."

"My stomach did not reject this food, and from that time on for several weeks I lived on Grape-Nuts and milk. I felt no pain whatever in my stomach, my health gradually came back and in five weeks I gained 25 pounds. I derived more strength from Grape-Nuts than I ever did from a meat and potato diet." "There's a Reason."

BANISHED

Coffee Finally Had to Go

Today's man knows that coffee even after they know it is doing them harm, is a puzzler. But it is an easy matter to give it up for good, when Postum Food Coffee is properly made and used instead.

A girl writes: "Mother had been suffering with nervous headaches for seven weary years, but kept drinking coffee."

One day I asked her why she did not give up coffee as a cousin of mine had done who had taken to Postum. But mother was such a slave to coffee she thought it would be terrible to give it up.

"Finally, one day, she made the change to Postum, and quickly her headaches disappeared. One morning while she was drinking Postum so freely and with such relish, I asked for a taste."

"That started me on Postum and I now drink it more freely than I did coffee, which never comes into our house now."

"A girl friend of mine one day saw me drinking Postum and asked if it was coffee. I told her it was Postum and gave her some to take home, but forgot to tell her how to make it."

"The next day she said she did not see how I could drink Postum. I found she had made it like ordinary coffee. So I told her how to make it right and gave her a cupful I made, after boiling it fifteen minutes. She said she never drank any coffee that tasted as good, and now coffee is banished from both our homes." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Michigan.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Humility in Service*

ONE of the lessons reiterated through the Bible is that of God's choice of humble men for his service. He passed by the proud, arrogant, self-sufficient man, and chose the obscure and the modest. Moses shrank from the task committed to him and pleaded his own incapacity. Gideon required a repeated miracle to convince him that he was really called. David was passed over by his own father as not being eligible for the crown, and even Samuel required to be reassured, and so on through the Old Testament. In the New, there were probably few men in all Palestine who appeared so unsuited for the apostolic work as the apostles themselves. Apparently God wished the world to understand that the instrument was nothing and that the power was his own, that, as Paul says, in discussing the fact (I. Cor. 1: 25-29), "No flesh should glory in his presence." When a great work is done, men naturally want to know who did it, and sing his praises and admire his ability; but if we learned the lesson so frequently repeated, we should perceive that it was the divine power working through an instrument, whose feebleness is proof positive that the power was not in him.

The fact should not astonish us. We know that humility is the true way to success. The hustling, self-sufficient man makes a great noise, but he is not the one who achieves great things. It is the quiet, steady, persistent worker, who studies and thinks, and gives himself to a cause, who really wins. The boy entering school with the conviction that he knows things, cannot be taught. He is the despair of his teachers and falls behind the boy who is conscious of his ignorance. The greatest of the violinists always charged double fees for the boys who had learned the rudiments of the instrument. The merchant who is sending a man on a difficult business chooses the one who will take instruction and follow it, rather than the one who has decided opinions of his own how it should be done. So with the preacher. He who forgets himself, who has no concern about his reputation for learning or eloquence, but is anxious only to deliver his message faithfully, finds a multitude of hearers. Spurgeon used to say when he saw the crowds struggling to hear him, that he could not understand it, and added, "If I were any one else, I would not cross the street to hear such preaching." In his humility and his dependence on God he found his power. "Not unto us, not unto us, but unto thy name, be all the glory."

Changed Lives†

DAILY life in the home and in the store and the office is the test of the reality of religion. If a man is no better in his relations with others for being a Christian, his religion is of very little use. He should be a better son, a better employee, a better employer and a better citizen because of his religion. The list of relations the Apostle gives in this epistle, are mere suggestions of principles that should control and animate the life of a Christian. Mere orthodoxy, important as that is, regular attendance at church and prayer-meeting, conscientious service in the Sunday School—all these may exist and flourish, and yet there may be no Christianity in the soul. Christianity does not consist in these things nor in Bible reading or prayer, good as these are, but in a changed character, a changed nature. "What shall I do to be saved?" men still ask, and the reply is now as ever, Believe. "As a man thinketh in his heart so is he." It is not by outward acts or by living according to any set of rules that a man becomes a follower of Christ; it is in becoming like Christ and having the nature of Christ. Over and over again he tried to make this known. He said he was the bread that came down from heaven, the which if a man ate he would have eternal life. He was the vine, and his people were the branches; his life must become theirs.

* Topic of the Epworth League for February 2. John 6: 14, 15; Luke 10: 17-22; Ps. 101.

† Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society for February 2. "The Heart of Christian Endeavor," Col. 3: 14, 15; 1: 1-9.

Then they would be his people and he would abide with them. Then, in whatever relation they might be placed to other people, they would "ring true"; they would show that they had been with Jesus.

Does this seem a mystery? We do not find it so in ordinary life. We have seen a child placed under a wise teacher coming to love that teacher, adopting his principles, growing into his character. We have seen a wayward boy quitting his wild courses, giving up bad habits for the love he bears a girl who has an influence over him. The power is common enough in every circle of society. So it is, with infinitely greater effect, when a man submits himself to the influence of Christ. He sees as in a mirror the character of Christ, and he is changed into the same image. The change may not be immediate—though even that has happened—but there is steady growth and the character is transformed. Love replaces hate, kindness takes the place of indifference, and gradually the whole man becomes a new creature in Christ.

JOHN McMURRAY.

Called Higher

Mr. A. C. Yawger, of Sidney, N. J., died recently. He was a great friend and lover of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Anna, wife of James H. Kinzer, died at Pleasant Valley, Meade County, S. D. Mrs. Kinzer was an exemplary Christian woman and for many years was actively identified with philanthropic and church work.

Mrs. Adelaide Johnson, of Lowell, Mass., was called home on August 20. She was an exemplary Christian. Being deaf she could not hear a sermon in church, but she said the sermons in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were a source of great comfort to her.

Mrs. Sarah Hamilton, of Milton, Vt., entered into rest December 17. She was greatly afflicted during the last few years of her life, but bore all her suffering with Christian fortitude. The CHRISTIAN HERALD had been a constant source of enjoyment to her for more than thirty years.

Mrs. Sarah A. Talley, of Talleyville, Del., who recently passed away, was for sixty-seven years an active member of Bethel M. E. Church, New Castle County, Del. She was a constant reader of this journal for many years. Her last hours were radiant with joy and hope. She said to those around her bedside, "Don't you hear that beautiful singing? It is so sweet and clear. There are thousands clothed in white and they are singing. 'All hail the power of Jesus' name.'"

Mrs. Eunice E., wife of Dr. J. Weeks, of Cleveland, O., passed away October 30, aged seventy-five. She was a mother of eight children, five of whom preceded her to the better land. She was born in Wakefield, Mass., in 1832, was converted at the age of fourteen and joined the Baptist Church. At nineteen, she was married to Dr. J. Weeks, on May 11, 1851, and they lived together nearly fifty-seven years. Her three children, Arthur B. Weeks, Chicago; Mrs. Joseph Wills, Niagara Falls, N. Y., and Mrs. William Leighton, of Cleveland, O., were with her in her last sickness. She was beloved by her children, fourteen grand and three great-grandchildren. Of her children, all became Christians from the ages of ten and fourteen years. She was a loving Christian mother, an ardent worker in the church and always seeking to bring souls to Christ. For several years she could not attend church, and in reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which she had read many years, she would say: "On Sunday we will read the sermon."

CHAPTER XII

THE BUSINESS OF AN ERASER

DURING the succeeding three weeks, Glenn Fraser was very active, and Charlie Lester and Miss Walker were his faithful abettors. Hawthorne had never known such a round of socials and picnics as the three conspirators managed to plan and to carry out; and in all of these festivities Mr. Allan was made the central figure. He and the young people became very well acquainted and very friendly, by these means, and the foundation of a complete understanding was laid upon which they could cordially co-operate.

Kathleen took this favorable opportunity to propose the reorganization of their long-defunct Christian Endeavor Society, and received such hearty support from all concerned, that a strong society was formed and fairly started on its career of usefulness, with Charlie Lester and Grace Alison as officers in charge.

The purchase of new singing-books for the Sunday School furnished an excuse for frequent musical rehearsals to which all the young people were invited; so that the choir increased in numbers and ability.

The efforts of the three conspirators did not end here. Judicious hints as to their pastor's lonely life, given to the older members of his congregation, led to numerous invitations to dinners and teas, until Mr. Allan laughingly declared that his people hardly gave him time to write his sermons or prepare his prayer-meeting topics.

Such an era of good feeling prevailed between pastor and people, that the young minister wondered why Hawthorne had been so distant before, and what had brought about the change. The more he considered the question, the more it puzzled him. Finally he decided to ask Miss Tilly whether she had noticed the difference, and whether she could account for it.

He lingered after breakfast one Monday morning, three weeks after the Haywards' sudden leave-taking, and Miss Tilly surmised that something important was going to be said; but his opening sentences surprised her:

"Miss Walker, before I came here, I was informed by the Home Mission Committee that something was radically wrong with this church. They told me that a minister rarely ever stayed more than a year here, and that the puzzling part of the whole matter was that they could discover no reason for such a condition, as the ministers sent here were good men, and the people appeared to take deep interest in the welfare of the church. They told me these things, and urged me, if possible, to discover the cause of the difficulties. I have been studying carefully, but can reach no satisfactory conclusion. Can you help me to one?"

Miss Tilly studied the pattern upon her coffee cup very critically for a minute or two, conscious of the anxious eyes that rested upon her face. Was this the auspicious moment for which they had been waiting? she wondered. Then she said thoughtfully:

"Yes, I know a reason—I know the reason—why Hawthorne church has lost so many good ministers, and has won such an unenviable reputation. The long and the short of the whole trouble is, there are too many erasers in this community."

"Too many what?" questioned the astonished minister.

"Too many erasers. Don't you know what an eraser is?"

"Yes, it is a bit of rubber used to erase something that has been written. Do you intend to apply that title to people in this community?" he asked, light beginning to dawn upon him.

"Yes," she answered. "An inanimate eraser does just what your hand desires it to do, and rubs out only that and nothing else: but a human eraser takes the liberty of rubbing out impressions made by you without regard to your feelings. Do you see the point?"

"In a measure," he replied, his brain turning with keen interest to the problem. "Do you intend me to infer that there are people in Hawthorne church who erase the influence and teachings of the ministers who have been sent to them? Is this why converts have been so few, and ministers have turned away in despair?"

"That is one way in which human erasers work, but there are also many other methods. Until the millennium dawns, I suppose that there will be jealousies and hatreds and deceit and suspicion in human hearts, and these must necessarily work out in human lives. So long as 'the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked,' and so long as 'the tongue is an unruly member which no man can tame,' I suppose we shall have to expect discord and evil-speaking upon the earth. I do not claim that there is any excuse for such conditions—there is no excuse for deliberate sin—but I do say that such things will be, and that we must be upon the watch lest they overwhelm us." She stopped to consider the subject for a moment.

"Go on," her listener said eagerly. "I am intensely interested, for I begin to understand your metaphor."

"If you understand, there is not much more to say. The human eraser rubs out the pleasant impressions which one person has made upon another; it destroys the memories of pleasant times and kindly words; it mars friendships and implants suspicions; it sweeps away the effect of the grandest sermon, and turns to naught the influence of the most earnest preacher, besides influencing the preacher himself. One of Shakespeare's characters boasted that he was not only witty but was the cause of wit in others. These erasers are not only malicious, but they make others malicious. One of our pastors, who was kind and genial at first, became censorious and satirical after a few months. He was soured by an eraser."

Again she stopped, and for a long time the two sat in silence, considering the words which she had spoken.

Finally Mr. Allan said: "And this is why so many ministers have failed here?"

"Yes. They did not discover that erasers were destroying the good effect of their efforts, and so in discouragement abandoned the field."

"Is this why my own work has been so long without fruit?"

"Yes." "What has caused the recent change in affairs?"

"That is your problem, not mine. Each person has to work that out for himself. Watch the influences that are brought to bear upon you, and carefully consider whether they tend toward good or toward evil. You will soon discover where the sources of your troubles lie; then you can save yourself." She rose from the table as she spoke, and the young man understood that she wished the conference to end.

"You have preached me a powerful sermon, Miss Walker, and I am truly grateful to you for it. It will be my own fault if I do not profit by it."

Gold Dust

is the greatest dishwasher ever invented, and when you stop to think that dishes have to be washed 1095 times a year, its use means a great saving. GOLD DUST will cut the grease and dirt like magic, make your dishes spotlessly white, and drive out every semblance of dirt or germs.

GOLD DUST Washing Powder starts to work the moment it strikes the water. It cleanses quickly, easily, thoroughly.

For washing dishes, scrubbing floors, cleaning woodwork, oilcloth, silverware and tinware, polishing brasswork, cleaning bathroom pipes, refrigerators, etc., washing clothes, softening hard water and making the finest soft soap.

“Let the GOLD DUST Twins do your work”

Fairy Soap

Many people pay as high as 25c a cake for toilet soap, thinking to secure a purer soap, when in reality they are paying for costly perfume and fancy coloring matter, which make the soap less pure, and oftentimes are used to disguise cheap, impure greases.

FAIRY SOAP is white—and stays white—because it is absolutely pure. It is made from edible products and contains no coloring matter or adulterant of any kind; yet FAIRY SOAP costs but 5c a cake. Why pay more, since there is no better soap at any price? Why even pay the same price for any other soap, and take the chance of exposing your skin to the discomfort and danger of cheap, inferior soap materials?

“Have You a Little ‘Fairy’ in Your Home?”

Sunny Monday Laundry Soap

We know every housewife in the land will be interested when we say that Sunny Monday Laundry Soap *(N.R.) will double the life of her clothes. The reason is that Sunny Monday Laundry Soap *(N.R.) is all soap, without rosin or excess moisture, and contains remarkable dirt-starting qualities, which begin their magic work the moment the soap touches the clothes.

Sunny Monday Laundry Soap *(N.R.) can be used in any kind of water—hot, cold, hard or soft—is kind to the hands, and will not shrink woolens and flannels or injure the most delicate fabrics.

*(N.R.) means "No Rosin." SUNNY MONDAY LAUNDRY SOAP contains no rosin. Rosin is an adulterant and will rot and ruin clothes. Because it is all soap, one bar of SUNNY MONDAY LAUNDRY SOAP will do the work of two bars of any other laundry soap

Mrs. R. M. H. K., Wisc. How long will it take to complete course in Esperanto? What books are needed besides your paper, if any?

The course will be finished in twenty-six lessons, published every other week. Students might be assisted somewhat by having an Esperanto Primer (10 cents), and a Vocabulary (10 cents), which can be procured from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

J. W. R., Springfield, Pa. In I Kings 17: 4, it says that Elijah was fed by the ravens. Does this mean that they were birds, or does it mean a people by that name?

The Hebrew word "orebim" has been interpreted as "Arabians" or "merchants," or perhaps as inhabitants of a town or district called Orbi, or Orbo, near Cherith. This has given rise to fanciful speculation concerning the real nature of Elijah's source of supply. A majority of the commentators, however, hold to the belief that the prophet received his food through the birds, as the Bible states.

B. M., Scranton, Pa. How many railroad ties, approximately, are used in the United States annually?

100,000,000 ties a year, according to the reports of the Forestry Branch of the Department of Agriculture. In 1906, the railroads paid $50,000,000 and used timber equivalent to the entire product of 600,000 acres of forest. The average price was 48 cents per cross-tie.

Gussie M., Kinderhook, N. Y. What is "tainted money"? Can money be so tainted as to be dangerous to handle?

"Tainted" money, in the ordinary acceptance of the phrase, is money that comes from an evil source, which is the proceeds of wickedness, or has been made in some immoral way, or is given for a bad purpose. That is the moral side of the matter. As to the material side, it is quite true that money may be so foul that it is dangerous to handle. An authority, Mr. A. Cressy Morrison, declares that money is an effective medium of communicating contagious diseases. He found bills and coins (received from a cheap grocery store), alive with bacteria. A penny had 26 living germs, a dime 40, a fairly clean bill 2,250, a very dirty bill 73,000.

G. L., Monroe, N. Y., sends this good desire for the new year:

That I may receive the divine light that no winds of temptation can ever blow out; strength that the fires of temptation cannot overcome; hunger for divine things that the pleasures of the world cannot satisfy.

Mrs. E. E. M., Andover, O. Kindly furnish information concerning Julius Maccabaeus.

He was a great Jewish military hero, the third son of Mattathias, and directed the great Jewish war of independence against the authority of Antiochus Epiphanes, King of Syria, and his successors, winning many brilliant victories. He fell at the battle of Eleasa (about B. C. 161). His principal triumphs were won at Samaria, Beth-horon, Emmaus, Bethsura, and in Gilead and Galilee.

L. L., Holland, Mich. 1. How many States are there in the Union? 2. Why is holly used at Christmas?

1. There are now forty-six States in the Union, Oklahoma having been admitted November 6, 1907. 2. It was probably first used as a decoration in northern climates on account of its cheerfulness and bright colors. Its name is supposed to come from the fact that it was used at Christmas in churches, and hence was called "holly tree." Later the present word "holly" came into use.

Minnie B., Mt. Solon, Va. 1. Why was the tower of Pisa built to lean thirteen feet? 2. How many Territories are there yet in the United States?

1. There is no reason to suppose that the architects (Bonnano and William of Innsbruck), intended that the tower should assume the oblique position. It probably took that position while the work was still in progress. 2. New Mexico, Arizona, District of Columbia, Alaska and Hawaii.

Mrs. H. E. W., Rockford, Ill., writes:

Dismas (according to the legend), was not the penitent thief. He cursed until the last. Dismas stole David, the high priest's son, when he was three years old, and compelled him to steal and murder. Dismas called him Titus. He was the penitent.

various kinds of disputes with employers, the latter aggregating some 2,000,000. The actual conflict, however, as in strikes, lock-outs, etc., has never affected more than 6,000,000 wage-earners and 1,500,000 employers, and only a small portion of the whole at any one time.

A reader of this journal, Mr. Cassius A. Castle of Burlington, Vt., sends us some verses in appreciation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its work, from which we quote these two stanzas:

Oh grand old sheet, dispensing benedictions,
And scattering blessings broadcast o'er the land;
Destroying errors, deepening right convictions;
Wielding the sword of truth with trenchant hand,

Thy power is felt by wicked men and traitors,
And they alone are thy relentless haters.

Long hast thou battled with right royal will,
Against the enemies of God and man;
In this, thy grandest year, be grander still,
And in its charging hosts lead thou the van:
The banner of the cross uplifted high,
And Christ and victory the battle cry.

P. M. G., Fort Gage, Ill., and J. W. S., South Bend, Ind. 1. Who first fixed the 25th day of December as Christmas? When was it so fixed? By what church? Who set up the first Christmas tree? 2. When were the Bible MSS. got together and put into book form?

1. There does not seem to have been any special observance of the nativity until the celebration in the Eastern Church (or Greek Christian Church) in A. D. 220. The Western (or Latin) Church began to celebrate it about a century later. Both adopted the uniform date about A. D. 380. There are some writers, however, who affirm that it was solemnly celebrated among the early Christians in the second century. Chronologists disagree as to the exact year of the nativity, but the majority believe it was B. C. 5. The celebration was at first held on January 6, but toward the end of the fourth century it was changed to December 25. The Christmas tree, it is said, was first used in Europe in the eighth or ninth century, and was introduced by a German or Hungarian princess. 2. It is claimed that the books of the Old Testament were collected and arranged under the supervision of Ezra, though modern scholarship rejects the claim. The epistles of Paul to the various churches were collected and incorporated with the other epistles and the Gospels and Revelation into one book during the first half of the second century, and, as we learn from Eusebius, were in general use soon after the year 300 A. D.

A Bible Treasure

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Allow an expression of our admiration and thanks for the India Paper Red Letter Bible. We are truly happy to possess the Blessed Volume in such perfect form and finish, so light and small to handle and with type clear and easily read by old or young. Above all, we rejoice you have adhered to the old Authorized Version, so beloved and treasured in the hearts of God's children for almost three hundred years. Thousands of young men who have never carried a Bible, will gladly obtain this, and many overcoat pockets will be the richer for its sacred presence. READER.

New York's Six Million Dollar Fire

ONE of the largest fires in the recent history of New York City occurred when the Parker Building, at the corner of Nineteenth Street and Fourth Avenue, was turned for hours into a seething furnace, and then left a blackened and gutted ruin. The Parker Building was one of the "skyscraper" type. It was thirteen stories in height, constructed of stone, brick and steel, and was called a fireproof structure; yet its destruction proves again how difficult it is to devise a building that will not succumb to the flames when they have made headway in stock and wooden fittings. The fire started about six in the evening and burned until about two in the afternoon of the next day. During the night, the flames shot 100 feet into the air and the empty windows glowed like live coals. The hose brought to the scene proved to be partly rotten, and about forty lengths burst while the firemen were endeavoring to get the flames under control. Streams of water were sent from neighboring skyscrapers into the upper stories. When the floors fell, three brave firemen lost their lives. Nothing but the shell of the structure now remains, and the weakened walls will probably be pulled down. The Subway is just under Fourth Avenue, and great fear was felt for a time that the walls might fall through and crush some passing train. The street is now covered with beams to prevent such a disaster. The building was occupied by several publishing and importing houses, and the total loss is at least six millions.

Issuing Licenses to Matrimonial Applicants at the New Marriage License Bureau, City Hall, New York

IN THE MARRIAGE LICENSE BUREAU

A NEW element of romance has been introduced among the usually prosaic and business-like surroundings of the City Hall, New York, since the opening of the Marriage License Bureau at the beginning of the present month. As in the olden times, City Hall Park has again become a strolling-place for young couples, with this difference, however, that whereas, in the old days, only two or three nationalities were represented, now there are candidates for matrimony from almost every land under the sun. When the new license office, which some have facetiously called "Cupid's Bureau," opens at ten o'clock, there are usually so many prospective applicants on hand that the attendant police officers marshal them in line, with some regard to regularity. Only about half a dozen couples can be admitted at a time to the little space in the Bureau office, facing the clerks. At first, owing to the lack of proper method, the place was crowded and the business of registration proceeded slowly. Now, however, matters have been expedited by the introduction of a very simple system. An officer passes down the line of waiting couples, and hands to each prospective groom a blank application and a card containing his number. They are then instructed to step into the library, where pens and ink are provided, and those who can write are expected to fill in the answers to the questions printed on the application.

In the library, the scene is a novel and amusing one. The applicants seat themselves at the long table and with mutual help and many smiles and quiet laughter, begin to fill up the long line of questions. Sometimes, when the groom or bride is a foreigner, imperfectly acquainted with English, an interpreter is called in to explain the true meaning of some puzzling question on the printed form. With the utmost care and with a fine perception of the importance of the task, it is at last completed. Name, age, color, birthplace and nationality, names of parents, occupation, are all duly recorded. Next follows the question whether this is the candidate's first marriage, and whether he or she is single or divorced. After all the questions relative to the groom on the left side of the application form are filled out and those relative to the bride on the right, the application is signed with the names of the parties in full. The couples now resume their place in the line and when the number of their ticket is called out, they step forward to the desk, where the applications are inspected, and a license filled out, to which is attached a certificate. This latter is to be returned to the Bureau by the pastor, priest, justice or other authorized official who performs the marriage ceremony. The bridegroom—sometimes it is the bride—hands the clerk a dollar and then the happy pair depart to complete their preparations for the prospective wedding.

An artist might find inspiration for his pencil in these scenes at the Marriage License Bureau. Dark-haired, swarthy Italians with diminutive sweethearts all decked with bright-colored finery and brilliant with jewelry; bearded young Hebrews from the East Side, with their pretty Jewish brides, resplendent in gold ornaments; fair-skinned Russians, sturdy-looking Germans, and blue-eyed Swedes and Norwegians, mingle with the American-born. Good humor pervades the atmosphere of the Bureau and smiles are on all faces; even the clerks seem to enjoy the situation. Now and then a more fashionable-looking couple appear in the line, and get through the business quickly and quietly. Occasionally a dusky-skinned pair of applicants come to the desk, and after a severe struggle with pens and ink in the library, contrive to fill in the forms. But the path of the matrimonially inclined is officially smoothed on all sides, and help is cheerfully given to the illiterate.

Among the recent applicants were no less distinguished persons than Miss Gladys Vanderbilt and her titled foreign fiance, Count Laszlo Szechenyi, who rode down together to the City Hall in an automobile, to take out their license. The application blank was filled out by the groom and signed by both the contracting parties, a license was issued, the fee paid, and they were at liberty to marry.

Perhaps the proudest bridegroom in New York, for a day at least, was Berthold Kats, who, with Miss Cecilia Kony as his betrothed, was the first to secure a license under the new State law, from the Bureau on the morning of opening day. Friends took away the license to have it set in a gold frame. Whatever may be said of the claim that the new system takes away much of the old-time romance of marriage preparation, it is unquestionably a pronounced success, and so great has been the demand for licenses some days recently, that two additional desks have been placed in the Bureau, and the clerical force increased.

"Them That Perish"

TEXT: I. Cor. 1: 18—"For the preaching of the Cross is to them that perish, foolishness."

A POET sits in the evening by his grate. His writings have carpeted his floors like the boudoir of a princess, and adorned his walls with the trophies of the sister arts, painting, and tapestry, and carving. The sunset flings its glories through his windows as from gates celestial, while from an adjoining room where his daughter touches the harp, dulcet notes float out upon the warm air, and flicker in the flash from the fire upon the ceiling of the library. His wife drops down upon a divan by his side and fondles his hand, and the poet says, "A beautiful world, my dear!" His other daughter nestles at the other knee, and as he stretches his hand to stroke her golden locks he murmurs again, "A beautiful world, my birdling!" And so, soothed and comforted, the poet falls asleep, and dreams a new poem of a beautiful world wherein none perish.

But after a time the poet awakes, and it is nine o'clock of a winter's night, and the wind is high and cold, and beating at the window. The harper from the other room has ceased, and come in to say, "Mamma, mamma, my head, my head! and I am cold!" And the mother has sprung up, and released the poet's hand—that is what awakened the curly-headed poet—and she says, "Ambrose, Ambrose, our daughter has a chill; go for the doctor!" As he passes out into the night, at the corner of the street a pauper stretches his blue hand out to him and says, "I perish!" But he responds, "I could not stop; for, though she be all housed and friended, my Felicia in my home has a chill in the blood, and is perishing!"

A Perishing Daughter

As he tugs at the door-bell of the physician, he crouches in the porch from the harsh, cold wind, and feels his own veins burning. They tell him the physician has gone up the street. "Why?" "Some one is perishing up there." "Tell him, tell him, our little Felicia is perishing, to come over to our dwelling." And as under the midnight stars the poet stands, drumming at the window and waiting for the man of skill, his dream of an hour or two ago returns to him, and he changes it and says, "Not a beautiful world, but a world in which many, many are perishing even now."

It is folly, and a sign of ignorance, to deny that this is a perishing world. We may be disposed to wish it were different, but it is as it is. The poet may start off with his premises, and say, "God is good; health is good; food is good; raiment is good; heat, friends, comforts of life, are all good; and in a good God's world he will surely allow none of his creatures to perish for the lack of these good things." And the argument seems sound until we turn to the hard facts. Then we see that the poet is mistaken. Men do perish in a good God's world for lack of raiment, for lack of food, for lack of the necessities of life. Explain it? I am not here for that purpose. I am presenting this fact to you: that they do perish in a good God's world. It is one thing to theorize as to what sort of a world this ought to be, to be according to our liking, and it is quite another thing to observe it with open eyes just as it is. One thing, with a concept of the Deity of our own making, to think what sort of a world it should be to correspond; another thing to find it just as it is, his world. The poet is a fool; the man with open eyes alone is wise.

The Cross a Necessity

The preaching of the Cross is called by them that perish foolishness. They say, "Perish! The Cross! You tell us that One died there that we might be saved, and that we are perishing? Why, it is all folly! Go preach that to the Puritans. We are all right. We are all safe. There is no harm going to happen to us in a good God's universe. No man will be allowed to perish." The preacher says, "Nay, it is not so. You yourself will have to admit that many perish." "Who perishes?" asks the gay doubter, when his gaiety is upon him. Well, the foolish perish, don't they? If any man refuses to take up the cross of self-denial, and believes that without the cross of self-curbing and self-crucifixion man will be saved, that man will perish will he not?

Oh, what a lot of mawkish talk and discussion there has been over that old and respected creed of the theologians! What a lot of foolish reportorial and editorial and sceptical nonsense has been sent abroad in this community with regard to that venerable creed which made New England great! They say, "The idea that a good God would let anybody perish!" And if I confess to you that I feel I am preaching to perishing men, you say, "Folly, folly! God is too good to allow men to perish." Is he? Do they not physically perish, and is that not painful and hard to explain in a good God's world?

Death's Precious Harvest

Last month eight hundred and ninety-seven human beings perished out of physical life in Boston; last week about two hundred and fifty. "Oh, well," says the doubter, "of course we are all mortal, and have to die." Not so fast. Of that two hundred and fifty, perhaps fifty of them came to their end because their days were numbered; old, ripe, full of years, a natural lying down; but the other two hundred, how many of them, when they perished, left a great seamed and bleeding gash behind! Oh, unutterable anguish over those two hundred other deaths! anguish that will not cease next Monday, nor a month from to-day, nor a year from to-day. The innocent, the fresh, the bright one, the child, the loved one, dropped out of life, and left anguished hearts behind. I am not an old man yet, but I carry a mark across the sky of my life which I never expect to see cleared out of the sky as long as I live. I can never get over it, don't expect to, don't try to. It has happened. I often laugh, but sometimes I catch myself up, and say, "How can you laugh since she has perished?" Perhaps I shall get over that. I listen to music, but underneath the song there is a diapason of a misere all the time. Perhaps I shall get over that. I sometimes prosper and carry home a new toy to the house, and I say, "Oh that she were here to enjoy it!" There are some of us who feel sometimes as if this air was so heavy that we could not breathe it any more. We shall never get over that. Explain that to me in a good God's world.

Forty Miles of Victims

I tell you that that is as hard to reconcile by the philosophies of men, if you and I undertake to say what he will do, and can do, and ought to do with his creatures, it is as hard to reconcile as eternal hell is. For they that perish in hell knew the laws they had broken, and were forewarned and told how they could escape; but the little child out of your home and mine—who knew the laws? who sinned? We can only fold our hands, and say, "It is the Lord. Let him do what seemeth to him good." All life is his. If he wished to take every life in this room, he could do it. If he wished to slay every human being in the city to-day, he could do it, and it would be nobody's business. I heard a remark of a gentleman regarding the terrible waste of life in the early wars of Joshua. Shall God answer to man what he does with a man's life, whether he destroys it by pestilence or by such war? Shall a woman answer what she does with her own thread and needle? Shall I answer what I do with the book I write myself? Shall God answer unto any as to what he does with human life?

But turn to the foolish who perish like this. Last year, in the United States, more than one hundred thousand drunkards perished as the result of their own folly. And God allowed it. How many are a hundred thousand drunkards? Lay them down side by side upon the moist earth of this morning, and they make a line nearly forty miles long. Lay them down by the track and the fast New York mail of to-morrow, flying along that track, would consume nearly an hour in passing from the first body to the last of the victims. Victims of folly, whom the good God allowed to throw away their lives in this wide land of ours by intemperance. He allows it, then, does he not? They perished. Reconcile it. Forty miles of buried hopes! Forty miles of blighted joys! Forty miles of wretchedness and premature decay in a good God's world. Those are facts.

"Ah! but," says some one, "eternity is a different thing from that." No; see. How old are these hundred thousand? On an average, say, forty years old. Multiply the hundred thousand by forty. Four millions of human years wasted unto desolation and wretchedness under the American flag, last year, by folly! Four millions of human years, with all the beauty of the training of childhood, and of the love of infancy, and all the possible joy they might have been to their own kindred, thrown away! Four millions of human years laid desolate in one land alone, by human folly, in a good God's world! Four millions of years is not eternity, to be sure, but it is just as hard to reconcile with any theory that man must judge God's goodness by what becomes of his sinning creatures, as an eternal hell is. I can no more solve the one than the other by philosophy. Four millions of human years is unthinkable. It is beyond any man's power to grasp it, just as much as eternity is beyond his power. This is a fact. Four millions of human years perish under our sight in a good God's world.

Responsibility for Perishing

Well, you say, how does the Christian religion reconcile it with his goodness? First of all by this: The Christian religion says, "He created and sent every human being into this world, and he brings every one of them to bend the knee before him in that great judgment scene, and he does not answer to any little philosopher in any part of this town, nor in any other town, as to what he does with the earth that he made, nor with the men and women in it." That is the first of our theses. The second of our theses is this: "As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live." Or this: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." The Christian religion lays the whole responsibility of the perishing, as the result of immorality, upon the will of desperate bad men. It is not one whit of it at God's door. God never sent a man to hell; God never will. If men are found there at last it is because they chose to go there. God never sent a man to a drunkard's grave; but we know that men do go there and they go there of their own accord.

There is not a criminal who perished as the result of the transgression of law in this land last year, but might have been saved by the cross. How so? The cross in two senses. First, the cross of self-denial. Some one said to the sinner, "You must put a curb upon your appetite, your passion, whatever it is, or you will die." Second, the cross of penitence and of mercy, to offer which God sent his Son, a sacrifice in our behalf. The preaching of the cross of Calvary is the declaration of his saving compassion to perishing men, and they respond, "Oh, talk that to the Puritan; we are all right. There is no danger. We are not perishing."

Perverted Forces

I make no apology to-day for lifting up a heavy hammer against this glass ball of a lying philosophy, which would teach you that there is no danger. I make no apology for telling you that there is a stern side to this world; that six months after every June there is a freezing January; that six months after every pleasing July there is a February; that it is a fact that strychnine will kill; that sin will send men to hell. The soul that sinneth, it shall die. Believe it. It is folly to deny it.

Last year, in the city of Boston, there were 5,000 women who were arrested for miserable, helpless intoxication. And yet every one of those women was dependent for every beat of her heart upon the finger of God, as if he had his finger first upon one ventricle and then upon the other, and kept the heart pumping. And not one of those 5,000 women could put out her hand to clasp it around that accursed glass, but the power to do it was the power of God—vitality. The only thing that was wholly her own was each woman's free choice; and she used the heart beat, the vital force to destroy herself; and she is perishing by her own choice. Those are facts.

Why, it is wonderful how blind we are to facts. Men

TWO HUNDRED DIE IN A FIRE-TRAP

The Front of the Burned Auditorium

Searching for Bodies in the Ruins

NOT since the fearful catastrophe at the Iroquois Theatre fire in Chicago, when hundreds of women and children were burned to death, has such a thrill of horror been felt throughout the country as when the report came over the wires from Boyertown, Pa., that nearly two hundred people had been crushed and incinerated at a similar fire in the Rhodes Theatre.

Those who were in the auditorium were members of St. John's Lutheran Sunday School, who had gone to hear a lecture by Mrs. Monroe on the Scottish Reformation. The lecture had been well advertised, and the pupils had looked forward to it for days as one of the literary treats of the season; and in addition there was a series of tableaux, in which many prominent young people of the town took part.

The lecture was illustrated with stereopticon pictures, the gas light for the lantern being supplied from a tank below the platform on which the lecturer stood. This tank was in the beginning the cause of the fearful disaster; but had the people kept their heads no one would have been killed.

The lecture was nearly over and the audience was gazing with rapt attention at one of the pictures which had been thrown upon the screen, when the gas tank exploded with a blinding flash. There was a deafening detonation and all of the windows were blown out at once and fell in jingling fragments to the streets below. The auditorium was on the second floor and the audience began, as one person, a mad stampede for the stairs. The fire-escapes were apparently not thought of, at least they were not used, except by a few. The ushers jumped on the platform and did all they could by word and gesture to calm the terror-stricken people, assuring them that there was no danger; but they might as well have talked to the wind. The slight blaze from the tank could have been put out in a few moments, but some of the audience, thinking they could escape by way of the stage, jumped on to the platform and overturned the small oil lamps that had been set as footlights. Then the flames began to spread. Some one on the stage pulled up the curtain, giving the draft full play, and the young people by their terror in full view of the audience added to the panic. The flames caught the curtain and shot hissing up the side woodwork, and in two minutes the auditorium was a seething sheet of fire.

Those who were near the windows began to jump out into the street, breaking arms and legs; and many falling head first had their skulls fractured. Those who had rushed for the stairs became jammed in a shrieking, struggling mass. Little children were trampled on and men and women fell. Many who might have escaped sought to drag out their relatives and friends, and were themselves caught in the vortex of human bodies and drawn down never to rise again.

A detachment of local firemen reached the scene, but their apparatus had broken down, and all they could do was to place ladders against the windows. Two hundred escaped by this means. Then the flames burst out from the bank below, driving the rescuers away.

People who had children in the burning building ran up and down in an agony of despair and grief, and made wild attempts to break through the fire lines and enter the building and rescue their loved ones. Right here comes one of the most horrible parts of the whole fire. Members of the local company of firemen went to a saloon near by, and became intoxicated. They returned and began to fight a sober company that had come dashing up to help from Pottstown. The latter had to defend themselves from the drunken ruffians and only six were left to fight the flames. Luckily, six stalwart troopers of the Pennsylvania Constabulary had arrived on the scene, and with drawn revolvers and waving clubs they charged into the drunken rioters, smashing right and left, and forced the intoxicated firemen beyond the fire lines, or drove them back to their duty.

Dr. Kohler ordered all of the saloons closed and gallant Sergeant Price of the Constabulary, who had brought his men with a rush from Reading, prevented with decisive measures any recurrence of the rioting. At last the flames died down and day dawned on the horror-stricken town. The High School was turned into a morgue, and soon sheltered the stark forms of two of its teachers and many of its pupils.

The stories told by the survivors give the only ray of light to the general gloom. One and all tell of heroic attempts at rescue made by people who willingly gave their own lives, that those weaker or less brave than themselves might live.

are perishing. Do you forget the battle of Magenta? I had a letter from a gentleman this morning which said: "Go with me to Italy in March," and it came to me in my thought, "Magenta, Solferino, Waterloo, Gettysburg, Fredericksburg: men perished there in a good God's world." What killed them? Man's selfishness. War is cruel; I hate it. The gayest uniform that was ever worn in battle is stiff, somewhere, with gore. All the pageantry of war is but mockery and misery to the widow. It is malice, meanness, lying, murder. It is either of the devil and hell, or is the destroying agent of indignant heaven. War is contrary to the Prince of Peace. Oh, you say, that is pretty strong. Ask the widow who sits here whether I put it strong enough. Poor heart, she would like to shriek, and tell the story of her sorrow these twenty years.

Now, I tell it again. Six months from June there is a terrible January. Look out for it. They do perish. If you should overstrain a nerve, look out for it; it will snap, the brain will soften, you will have neurasthenia, you will have that strange something, nervous prostration. If you will not dig, then you shall perish. It is a cold world. If you will trifle with fire, you will burn yourself. If you trifle with light, you will put your eyes out. I remember a fellow student who gazed too long through a telescope at the sun and lost his sight. If you trifle with sound, it will put your ear out. I remember when a boy, at some celebration, a playmate lost his hearing in the thunder of the gun, standing too near. If you trifle with your good name, you will lose your credit. If you lose your credit, you will lose your standing in trade. If you lose your standing, you lose your bread and butter. It is a cold world.

There is a hard side to life, in spite of the fact that a good God looks down from on high. If you trifle with your appetite and passion, you must suffer for it. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," and any man who says different from that is a misled misleader or a liar. The soul that sinneth, it must pay the penalty. It is written all over the world.

There is no place to sleep except when you have gotten into the arms of Jesus Christ. There is no place to lie down and rest except in the bosom of Abraham. Take up the catalogue of any of those boyhood school-days of yours. Before I came here, I took up the catalogue of the School of Technology, which the president kindly sends me, and ran it over, and I saw so many of them who are in high places of mechanical trust and power; but as I ran down the pages, I saw here and there "died," "died," "died." Some broke a law, innocently or knowingly. In a good God's world, they died.

Every week of my life, some poor hearts, some in kid gloves, and fine dress, and some walking upon their bare feet, with an excuse of loather on top of the foot, derelicts of society, ring my bell and come in and say, "I thought as you were a minister, perhaps you would help me." If I had ten thousand dollars, I could, as the almoner of it, give every cent of it away in six months, and every dollar should help some wretched and abandoned derelict, who is perishing out of the world. Look out. There is a cold side in a good God's world.

There is a remedy. What is it? The preaching of the Cross is survival, power to live, the love of God come down, hanging there, and saying, "Look, and you shall have power to survive." Is any one here doubting the goodness of God? There it is upon the Cross. Every one may outlive his troubles. Is there any one here perishing from a weak will? Look, and have power to survive. Is any one perishing in the grip of a bad associate? Look, and have power to survive. Is any one perishing under the hold of a bad habit? Look, and have power to survive. Is any one perishing under the load of his guilt, ten years old? Look, and have power to survive. Is any one perishing with an unhappiness that makes life seem as if it were not worth living? Look, and have power to survive. Is any one dying physically? Look, there is the power of the immortal life in the Cross of Christ.

Perishing, perishing; I hate the word. Something in my soul rises up and revolts against it. Perish? No; let me live. A week from to-day is my birthday. How old are you a week from to-day? My boyhood has perished. My youth has perished. My manhood—will it perish? Yes. My age—will it perish? O God, what is this law of wreck and ruin? Year after year I have seen the brilliant summer perish. A thousand times I have seen a sunset costly beyond the gold of Ophir, yet they are perished. They tell me that the sun and old stars are perishing. Great God, I must live above this. Oh, to survive! My hopes say I must; my love asserts I must. I climb up to-day and put my arms around the Cross, in all this surging sea of death and ruin, and I hear the words of my Master, "I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Clinging there to that Cross I cry, "Surviving, surviving, surviving by the power of God." Will you?

Midshipman Sigsbee

IN a former article I said they managed to graduate me from the Naval Academy. Only once had the superintendent sent for me. That was towards the end of my course. He said to me very severely: "For the past week you have a very low average mark in mechanics. Professor G—thinks that with proper application you can learn. I don't think so. You will surely 'bilge.' You may go." Outside the room I met Gridley of my class—noted of Manila—awaiting his turn. Gridley's name was Charles V., by which token we called him "Steve." I lingered near till Gridley reappeared. He was addressed in precisely the same words. Happy thought! The superintendent had applied his general formula. We smiled and dispersed.

My first command was of a steamer named for that superintendent, who was really a very tender-hearted man. His portrait adorned my cabin. My work for four years was deep sea exploration. I was obliged to invent much apparatus—the application of mechanics, let it be noted. For my work and inventions I got many commendatory letters, election to scientific societies, diplomas, a gold medal from England, the cross of the Red Eagle of Prussia from Emperor William I., and other honors. Thus was I revenged—but for what I hardly know.

Part of my class had gone into active service in June, 1863. The other part—my part, of course—was obliged to make the summer cruise in one or another of three practice ships. I was assigned to the Macedonian. We visited England, France, Portugal, Spain, and Madeira. Arriving back at Newport on September 26, we were granted twenty days leave to visit our homes. I left Newport with a monkey in a box, the spoils of my cruise. At the Clarendon Hotel in New York, where I stopped for a day, my monkey got adrift during my absence, and had the time of his life with the friction matches, happily without serious results. The naval men gets over importing branch coral and monkeys rather early in life, but the parrot habit lasts longer.

On October 1 I was promoted to Acting Ensign in the Navy of the United States, a lucrative position, paying $1,200 per annum in "greenbacks," gold being quoted somewhere around $2.80. Under orders, I reported, November 4, on board the supply steamer Bermuda, at Philadelphia, for passage to New Orleans, there to report to Commodore H. H. Bell for duty on board the Monongahela in the West Gulf Blockading Squadron. The Bermuda sailed the next day with many officers on board. Of my class were Charles E. Clark, since of the Oregon; Francis A. Cook, since of the Brooklyn; Colby M. Chester (all now retired Rear-Admirals); Dennis W. Mullan, now retired Commander, and William A. VanVleck and Louis Clark, both now dead. Mullan also was intended for the Monongahela. The Bermuda touched at many places. On the passage from Pensacola to the fleet off Mobile, she recaptured a merchant schooner that had been taken by Confederates in an armed lugger. We fired several shots and got six armed Confederates. This, though rather insipid, was my first taste of war.

At New Orleans, Mullan and I were told to continue on board the Bermuda and join the Monongahela off the coast of Texas. We fell in with our ship off Pass Caballo. Banks' army was marching north along the coast. The Monongahela, under the command of Commander James H. Strong, was covering the movements of the army. On November 28, the day of our arrival, a "norther" was blowing and the seas were heavy. We were put into a boat with our trunks, taken in tow by an army transport and dropped near our ship. We got on board the Monongahela wet and with some difficulty, but got a hearty reception in the wardroom. Soon came word from the deck that Mullan's trunk had been lost overboard. It contained his entire outfit. When we reported to the captain a conversation ensued. Very patronizingly the captain said, "Mr. Sigsbee, how much sea service have you had?" "Nine months, sir," I replied. "How much have you had, Mr. Mullan?" "Six months, sir." The captain looked disgusted as he exclaimed, "And they have sent you to my ship as watch officers! Gentlemen, I was fifteen years in the service before I got where you are now." With deprecating amiability, I ventured to remark that "great events made great opportunities," and this our good captain took smilingly. In dismissing us he bent his brows, and stung us with the warning, "Young gentlemen, we shall attack the shore battery before breakfast in the morning."

Fort Esperanza, at Pass Caballo, mounted seven guns. The Monongahela carried eight. Banks' army was coming on, shelling the prairie in advance. The fort was an obstacle to be removed by the Monongahela. On the 29th the sea was still running too high to permit the ship to move close in shore. As to the next day, I will quote from a letter that I wrote to my father:

"On the morning of the 30th the wind had gone down, so as soon as day dawned we moved up to take the battery. I was awakened and told that we were going to beat to quarters in a few minutes. I dressed and went on deck, where everybody was standing about watching the fort. We were soon within range, when suddenly I saw a flash, and at the same time a huge volume of smoke arose from the fort. I thought it was a gun and expected to hear the whizzing of a shot, but none came. The explosion came from their magazine, and 'Secesh' skedaddled."

But there stood Mullan and Sigsbee, bold warriors by intention, and not yet shot at. The Monongahela had been in many fights and skirmishes. One of her captains had been killed and two wounded. Her deck and other woodwork was scarred in many places. I had been given charge of the second division, consisting of one eleven-inch pivot and one broadside gun. Active service struck my fancy, so I was full of zeal and did my best to do and to learn. The first thought of us young officers was to make an honorable record.

For some time thereafter we were active, chiefly in reconnoitering Confederate batteries along the coast. At the end of this service the ship was ordered to join the blockading vessels off Mobile Bay. Touching at the Southwest Pass of the Mississippi for coal, she ran full speed into a sunken Confederate ironclad, and damaged her own stem badly. After joining off Mobile, she was ordered to New Orleans for repairs, where we remained for a long time, when we again went off Mobile.

The first shot ever fired at me left no trail of glory. It came from our own side. After leaving New Orleans I had charge of the deck while passing Fort St. Philip; at night, I think. A shot from the fort went overhead. The ship was stopped, and an officer of the fort came on board to identify us. He was good enough to explain that the fort had only followed custom in firing at a vessel that failed to stop. No offense, so we continued on down the river. At least I was one shot to the good over Mullan. I think it was in June that we rejoined off Mobile.

The monotony of the blockade was trying. Week after week we lay at our anchors, out in the open sea, rolling and pitching and taking the gales as they came. There was little to do beyond carrying out our routine drills and watches, and eating our three meals a day. Some of the night watches, however, were tense with watchfulness. Once I was sent in shore in charge of the night picket boat. It came on cold and rough weather.

We held on as long as possible. Finally we pulled for the Penguin, an inner-line vessel, missed her, but made fast to a line that she floated to us. We came near being carried out to sea that night. Once a boat expedition was arranged to go inside and cut out an armed steamer. It was promised that I should be a member of the party, but the attempt was abandoned for some reason. Beyond the result of running my freshly sharpened sword into my own foot no blood was shed. I was having a hard time getting squarely into the war, but fighting came soon.

On June 25 I was transferred to the Brooklyn, a larger vessel, at my own request. The Brooklyn was commanded by Captain James Alden, a gallant officer with a fine record. Lieutenant-Commander Edward P. Lull was executive officer, and Lieutenant Thomas L. Swann was navigator. Acting Ensigns Cassel and Pennington, of my class, were on board. Alden is dead. With one exception, I think, I am the only living member of the wardroom mess. In July there were rumors of impending attacks on Forts Morgan and Gaines, whose powerful armament guarded the entrance to Mobile Bay. Of the great battle that followed—the crowning event of Farragut's career—writers have written in full. I am asked to write only the personal narrative of a junior officer, nineteen years of age, who shared the danger inconspicuously. In the final plan of battle Farragut was persuaded to take second place in the line or column, allowing Alden to lead in with the Brooklyn. The battle was fought August 5, 1864. The object was to pass the forts at the entrance, anchor in the bay and thus command the forts from the rear; then to protect the landing of the army and compel the forts to surrender—all of which was done.

The fleet was five or six miles from Fort Morgan. We were up and about before daylight. The ships were already cleared for action. A flood tide and a light southwest wind were setting into the bay. The sky was cloudy, threatening rain. We were to pass close to Fort Morgan, on our starboard hand, leaving Fort Gaines rather remotely to port. To each of the seven larger vessels another vessel was lashed alongside. If a vessel lost propulsion, her mate could keep her going. If both lost it, then the wind and tide might carry them in. In the main column the seven pairs of vessels were disposed as shown below. On their right were four iron-clad monitors, also as shown.

Octorara—Brooklyn	Tecumseh
Metacomet—Hartford	Manhattan
Port Royal—Richmond	Winnebago
Seminole—Lackawanna	Chickasaw
Kennebec—Monongahela
Itasca—Ossipee
Galena—Oneida

Inside were the Confederate iron-clad flagship Ten- nessee, and the gunboats Gaines, Morgan and Selma, which would meet us with a raking fire. Across the channel a line of torpedoes was planted. We were to pass through a narrow fairway close to Fort Morgan.

At 6.15 the Brooklyn was under way with the Octorara alongside, and proceeding toward the bay. A stop was made to allow the vessel to close up and the monitors to precede us. Prayers were read, I think, and the captain made a speech to the crew. Battle flags were then hoisted, and at 5.45 the fleet steamed in.

I felt the coming danger and would gladly have had it over, but I wanted my career to include that fight. The fleet moved slowly. The Tecumseh fired the first shot at 6.47. At 7.06 Fort Morgan opened fire. Soon the Brooklyn replied with her bow chasers. Later, as the fort drew abeam, our broadside guns opened and the action became general. My veteran messmates had declared that I would dodge instinctively when a shot passed over me—that men did it until actively engaged. I had promised to stiffen up, in the expectation of getting chaffed if I failed. I can now attest that those old-time "round shot" from a "great gun" came toward one with a crescendo roar, passed overhead with a terrific shriek and left with a diminuendo roar, unless they struck near. Our men tended to sink down in unison at a coming shot, before we opened. I "jollied" them a bit and they smiled back at me. I dared not join company, but, just the same, I felt creepy in the muscles intended for dodging. When we were getting back at the Confederates, there was no shrinking. Of my four guns only the two on the starboard side were engaged. One of my gun captains was Barnett Kenna, a fine, stocky, curly-headed little Englishman, so full of fight that I had to watch his elevation carefully. The other was William Halstead, a tall, thin American, cool, calm and with his wits all aboard. In the second stage of the fight Halstead picked up a Confederate round shot that had come on board, loaded it into his gun and fired it back. Both of these men got medals. At the rear of my guns was the steering wheel, at which stood Joseph Brown, quartermaster, and John Irlam, seaman. Brown chewed tobacco and smiled throughout, occasionally commenting on the beauty of the fight. In a terrible way it was highly picturesque. Back of me also was the hatch, down which the wounded were lowered to the surgeons in the after hold.

The first or second shot from the fort struck one of our ironclads. It passed on and struck our foremast rail. The next went through our mainmast. Two more went through that mast, covering us with minute splinters. Soon the roar of guns was nearly incessant. The air was full of smoke and flying missiles. Great splinters were hurled about, and men were falling, killed or wounded. The blood was so thick around the hatch that I rolled up my trousers. Cassel was borne to the hatch, struck on the head by a splinter and bleeding. We had had a quarrel. I ran to him, expressed my solicitude, and our chumship was restored. While lowering in the cot, he recovered and returned to his guns, the blood trickling down his coat.

In the midst of the noise and smoke, I felt the ship backing and heard something about shoal water ahead and the Tecumseh torpedoed and sunk. The order was passed to fire and make a smoke when we could not see the fort. Then I saw the flagship Hartford pass us slowly on the port hand. The Brooklyn sheered to port and followed her. The Tennessee tried to ram the Hartford and failed. She then tried the Brooklyn and failed. I took a shot at her myself with Halstead's gun, and struck her over the port bow harmlessly. I caught up a rifle and fired through a port at the loader of her bow gun. Then I mounted the mizzen topsail sheet bitt for a shot over the rail. While intent on my aim, a shot went shrieking close over my head. I dodged! It was as shameful a dodge as any man ever made. The men grinned benignantly.

We passed right through the line of torpedoes. During the most of this time we were pounded by the Confederate vessels as well as by the fort. Our leading vessel was past the fort by 8 o'clock and all were past by 8.30. The Confederate vessels were scattering. Unknown to me, the Metacomet had cast off from the Hartford and gone in chase. Discerning a vessel in range, I took the lockstring of one of my guns and aimed at her. I became aware that people were calling my attention insistently. Looking up, I saw Captain Alden and others, lined up on the poop, shouting to me that I was aiming at the Metacomet. I had been so deafened by the noise of battle that I could hardly hear at all. Other vessels went in chase. The Selma surrendered to the Metacomet. The Gaines, damaged and leaking, was run ashore on the beach. The Morgan retired under the guns of the fort and at night escaped to Mobile.

After passing the fort I mounted the poop deck to watch the fire of our two stern chasers, which were manned by marines. While I was there a shot hit Michael Murphy, private marine, struck the deck about six feet from me, rebounded, and hit William Smith, private marine, who was hardly two feet in front of me. Murphy fell, a mangled mass, at my feet. Smith disappeared. He was killed and hurled overboard so quickly that I did not know it until told by officers standing behind me. I had been directing my attention to Murphy. Lieutenant Charles F. Blake was on the poop wounded but unconcerned about himself.

Shortly before 9 o'clock most of our vessels were anchored in the bay about four miles from Fort Morgan, when the Tennessee, with Admiral Buchanan, was seen approaching to attack the whole fleet single-handed, a forlorn hope equaling in courage and hardihood Farragut's passage over the torpedoes at the entrance. Our vessels got under way. The Tennessee first attacked the Brooklyn and raked her with the bow gun.

She intended to ram, and the Brooklyn presented her bow. The Tennessee sheered to port and the ships passed each other broadside to broadside about fifty feet apart. For some reason the Tennessee reserved her fire, probably for the flagship Hartford. As she drew aft I sat down in an empty port to look at her. A man ran to me and cried, "For God's sake, Mr. Sigsbee, don't sit there; they will pick you off with a rifle." I had been thinking only of her awful broadside guns. Then she was engaged by the whole fleet. She was rammed first by my old ship the Monongahela, followed by the Hartford and Lackawanna, but without damage. Finally, with Admiral Buchanan badly wounded, hammered by all the vessels, her smokestack and steering gear shot away and her port shutters jammed, she surrendered. The battle of Mobile Bay was over.

The Hartford, Brooklyn, and Oneida had suffered most. The Brooklyn was struck fifty-nine times, and had fifty-four men killed and wounded—fifty-eight, I think, by final report. On board she was an awful scene of havoc and destruction. The dead were lying about and wreckage was everywhere—another sign that "War is hell." My further personal experiences at Mobile were not especially eventful. Let it suffice to say that Fort Gaines surrendered on August 8, and Fort Morgan on August 23—to the army and navy, jointly. I drew a plan of the fleet's battle which was given to Admiral Farragut by Captain Alden. I also drew a diagram of the Brooklyn, showing the places where she was hit. It was published in Harper's Weekly, and Admiral Buchanan inclosed a copy in his report to the Confederate Government. The Brooklyn went to Boston for repairs and later was in the bombardments of Fort Fisher. Cassel and I were on shore in the assault on that fort.

Our Pledge to Cuba

IN the announcement by the President that the control of affairs in Cuba will be formally transferred to the Cubans themselves in the spring of 1909, we recognize an important step toward the fulfilment of our pledge of ten years ago, to give that island self-government. It is somewhat of a surprise, however, as it was not generally understood that Cuba was yet prepared to assume so great a responsibility alone. Should the decision prove to be premature, it would be unfortunate; but it is to be presumed that our government has sufficient information to warrant the step.

Governor Magoon's recent report shows that the Cubans have made remarkable progress under the Provisional Government. Economic conditions have changed for the better; general sanitation in the leading cities has routed out those deadly diseases that formerly claimed many victims each year, and the internal relations of the islanders are more harmonious than heretofore. But much remains to be done. The various departments must be made to work smoothly, new electoral laws, and laws dealing with the executive control, the army and the civil service, are needed. When these are passed the preparatory work will be completed for the coming change.

Governor Magoon's administration has been a wise and temperate one, and has resulted in healing many of the old breaches that stood in the way of that harmonious unity of feeling and action which were essential. In a word, Cuba has learned its lesson, and twelve months hence will be permitted to manage its own affairs. We shall not, however, relinquish our interest in Cuba, for the paternal counsel and co-operation, and, if need be, the active assistance, of this government will be at the service of the island republic, should occasion arise. Such a contingency, however, is not deemed probable. Let us hope that there are bright days ahead for the island republic.

Saving Our National Memorials

AMERICA for many years was careless in regard to the preservation of its historical spots and places. Memorials of great national interest were allowed to fall into neglect, to crumble into ruin and live only in a few lines of description in some book of history. Although this country has but three centuries of history since its first settlement at Jamestown, it has had and still has buildings of great historical interest in which deeds have been enacted that have shaped the destiny of millions of people, or which have been the homes of famous soldiers and statesmen.

Within the last few years the several States and many historical societies and individuals have awakened to the need of quick action in order to preserve for our own and succeeding generations those structures that yet remain.

One of the most praiseworthy moves in this direction was made recently by Representative Gaines, who represents in Congress the district in Tennessee in which "Old Hickory" (Andrew Jackson) lived. On "Jackson Day," the anniversary of the battle of New Orleans, he introduced a bill to appropriate a certain sum to be paid to the Ladies' Hermitage Association, for the purpose of keeping in repair and maintaining Jackson's home, which bears the picturesque designation of The Hermitage.

The expense of maintenance has been borne hitherto by the State of Tennessee, but as the Hermitage is in reality a national memorial, and of equal interest to North, East, South and West, it seems fitting that the "burden," if such it could be called, should be placed on the national government.

In other parts of the country people are working untiringly that historic buildings in their localities be preserved to teach lessons of patriotism.

The people of Massachusetts are preserving the homes of the Adams family, the Old State House, and several colonial mansions. In Virginia the Society for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities is saving many historic buildings, and so on through an increasing list. Every American should take part in this work. It is not so much a matter of money as of personal influence against vandalism, indifference, and a commercial greed that often destroys these memorials on the plea that they stand in the way of progress. It is to be hoped that we will not, as a nation, make progress in such a way as to break entirely with the past of which these places serve as the reminders. The saying of a great American statesman, that if we forget the deeds of our forefathers we are ourselves unworthy to be remembered, is as true to-day as when it was first uttered.

The Hand on the Plow

"NO man, having put his hand to the plow, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God."

This admonition from the world's Redeemer is one that deserves to be written in letters of gold on the doorposts of every Christian home, as a perpetual reminder of our vows of loyalty and consecration and a stimulus to Christian achievement. Only by entire devotion, self-sacrifice, and never looking backward, have the greatest spiritual victories been made possible.

To all who are seeking for that inspiration which leads to nobler and higher effort, we offer this passage as a motto text for the coming months of the new year.

If you have not already done so, find out some practical work in which you can serve God and your fellow-men and women. Put your hand to the plow with courage and confidence and turn not back. Do not let the allurements of the world call you aside from that one cherished task to which you are consecrated. It may be church work, or charity, or ministering to the sick, the fatherless and the widow, or hospital visiting, or holding up the hands of some devoted missionary in a foreign land. There are many kinds of servants and many ways of serving the Master. Find out the one way in which you can render the best service and strive to excel in it—not for the sake of eclipsing others, but to stimulate them by your influence and example to similar effort.

In the passage quoted, Jesus made it clear to his disciples that all their devotion and service were to be contributory to the inbringing of his kingdom on earth. And this is the aim and purpose of all Christian service which is performed joyfully for the love of Christ and the advancement of his kingdom. If all who profess to follow him would realize this, and would unite this year as a solid phalanx for a world-wide Gospel campaign, we believe there would be workers enough and means enough to carry the message of salvation to the remotest parts of the earth, and thus literally to fulfil the command to "preach the kingdom of God to all nations."

Will Congress Restore the Motto?

THROUGH the energetic efforts of the advocates of restoration, the issue whether the time-honored motto "In God We Trust" shall be restored to the national coinage, or permanently omitted therefrom, has been presented squarely and fully before Congress. Messrs. Jones (Ala.), Sheppard (Tex.), and other representatives, have set forth in able addresses the prevailing national sentiment in favor of restoring the motto. They have incorporated in their presentation the mass of letters received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from every State in the Union, and these have appeared in the pages of The Congressional Record as a national protest against the removal of the words which the whole world has regarded as an expression of the faith and religious hope of the American people.

We believe the tide of sentiment in favor of putting back the motto has only begun to rise. When it reaches the flood, every member of the House of Representatives should be deluged with letters from his constituents, urging him to work for restoration. It should be kept steadily in view that this fight for the motto is really a part of the greater battle that has been waging for some time past, for the purpose of establishing before the civilized world the fundamental truth that ours is a Christian nation; that this government was founded on the principles of the Christian religion; and that this fact is recognized by our highest tribunal—the United States Supreme Court. When the issue was raised, a few months ago, a leading New York lawyer, Mr. Gilbert Holmes Crawford, acting for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, after a brief search of the records, brought to light the convincing evidence that the United States Supreme Court, the Supreme Courts of New York and Pennsylvania, and the Superior Court of New York had authoritatively ruled that the nation was Christian; that the Christian religion was "part and parcel of the common law," and that under statute law, that religion, as the religion of the people, was exclusively protected by enactments which provided for the punishment of those who should assail it, or revile the name of its sacred Founder.

That the removal of the motto is closely related to the larger question of the nation's Christianity is also evident from the satisfaction its elimination has afforded to the atheists, the sceptics, and the enemies of religion generally. Their gratification is undisguised. They point to its absence as a proof of their assertion that our people are no longer followers of the faith held by the founders of this Republic. Shall this assertion be permitted to go unchallenged? Rather, by restoring the motto, let us proclaim anew to all men our national faith in God, and our unshaken dependence upon his protection.

Admiral Sigsbee at Mobile Bay

THERE can be no more delightful reading than the second article of the famous series by Admiral Sigsbee, which we publish in this issue. It tells of his first active sea service in the eventful days of the Civil War. We catch a glimpse of gallant comrades of the young midshipman whose later careers were written in great deeds. The Admiral has the rare faculty of telling a story so realistically that the reader seems an actual spectator. No better description of the battle of Mobile Bay has ever appeared in contemporary literature, and its value is all the greater as coming from a participant. Young and old must take a deep interest in these reminiscences, two more articles of which are yet to appear.

India's Famine Peril Over

FROM Lahore, India, comes the welcome news by cable that copious rains have fallen throughout the Punjab, effectually relieving the drought which has prevailed there during the last six months. The fears of a repetition of the famine of several years ago are now happily dissipated. A great calamity has been averted, and doubtless many thousands of lives have been saved by the precious rain. There are no reports thus far, of rainfall in the eastern sections of the drought area, but hopes are entertained that these districts have also shared the welcome relief.

New York's Great Library

AFTER tedious delays and many postponements, New York is at last to have a library building worthy of the city. It is now twelve years since the legislative difficulties were overcome, and the act was passed consolidating the libraries given to the city by John Jacob Astor, James Lenox, and Samuel J. Tilden. A site for a building had then to be provided, and the plans chosen. In May, 1900, the foundations of the new library were laid, and in July, 1902, the first marble course was set. It was not until December, 1906, that the roof was actually placed. The building is still far from complete, but it is possible now to realize what it will look like and what the internal arrangements will be. The money already expended amounts to, $5,846,569, and a further sum of $1,000,000 will be needed to complete the building, bringing the total cost up to $7,000,000. The building will contain three hundred rooms and is to have a total floor space, exclusive of cellarage, of 375,000 square feet, which is greater than that of the Library of Congress in Washington. Its general character is rectangular and with its various courts it will occupy the space between Fifth and Sixth Avenues from east to west, and between Fortieth and Forty-second Streets from north to south. It will have a capacity for three and a half million books, which is more than double the number now in hand, thus affording room for growth. Ingenious devices have been introduced for bringing books from distant rooms to the main reading-room and for conveying readers to the departments they have to visit. Special care, of course, has been taken to render the building absolutely fire-proof, the invaluable treasures it is to contain demanding the utmost care in that particular. This has had to be combined with plans for heating and lighting, which required skilful adjustment. There is the more need for care in this matter from the fact that some of its contents cannot be duplicated. There are books and pamphlets of historical importance which patriotic citizens have secured that the libraries and museums of other lands vainly endeavored to obtain. Among these are original manuscripts of the sixteenth century and some rare specimens of Hebrew and Slavonic works. It is estimated that if no further legislative or economic delays arise, the building will be ready for opening in three years' time, and the literary treasures of the city will then be consolidated and at the service of the citizens. If the spirit of the ancient preacher could look down at those treasures he would find in it proof beyond his conception of his declaration:

Of making many books there is no end. (Ecc. 12:12.)

Missed Their Christmas

A pathetic complaint from a traveler appears in the San Francisco Chronicle. He has been traveling across the Pacific, and it was his misfortune to be at the 180th parallel of longitude on December 24. That being the parallel opposite to Greenwich, from which longitude is reckoned, it is necessary there to rectify the vessel's time. The traveler westward has to bring himself into accord with other parts of the world by dropping a day out of his calendar. This traveler, who went to bed on the night of December 24, was astonished to find when he awoke in the morning that it was December 26. He had lost his Christmas Day. His complaint in the paper elicited a reply from another traveler who last year had two Christmases, as he crossed the same line traveling eastward. Christmas Day had been celebrated on the ship and the line was crossed in the evening of that day; but the next morning it was December 25 over again, for a day had been added to the calendar. If there had been on board any of our friends who insist so strongly on the seventh-day Sabbath, they would have been perplexed as to the day on which the Sabbath fell, until they found friends on shore to inform them. Even then they might have been in doubt when they counted the days of the week they had passed on the steamer in the Pacific, and might have had to fall back on the apostolic injunction:

One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. (Rom. 14:5.)

A Stamp for a Bridal Outfit

There was a flavor of romance about a recent auction sale in Philadelphia in which were some old postage stamps. Shortly before the sale the auctioneer had received a visit from an aged lady, who brought him some old stamps to sell. She belonged to an old Virginia family, which had been very wealthy before the war. Since then she had known the pinch of poverty, and as one after another of her household died, the resources became increasingly straitened. She had with her, as her sole relative, a dearly loved granddaughter, and it was her ambition to provide her with a trousseau suitable for a girl of her lineage. But as time passed, there was less and less prospect of doing so. About two months ago, in sorting the contents of an old trunk, she found a number of letters, yellow with age, tied together with a faded ribbon. Opening the package she saw that they were love letters, which she had received about sixty years ago from the man who afterwards became her husband. They were in their original envelopes and she noticed how peculiar the and she was descended from Sir John Sutton, whose ancestry is a matter of record, as in other English aristocratic families. It passes through several generations to Thomas Holland, Earl of Kent, to Edmund, son of Edward I., King of England, and Margaret, his Queen, who was the daughter of Philip III., King of France. The fact of Washington's royal ancestry will not enhance the admiration with which American citizens regard him. It is the royalty of his fine character, not of his blood, that makes him an object of veneration to the people, who delight to call him "the father of his country." To this royalty of character all may aspire, disregarding the rank of ancestors.

Begin not to say within yourselves, we have Abraham to our father; for I say unto you that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham. (Luke 3:8.)

An Extraordinary Will

A will filed in the Surrogate's office in Brooklyn, N. Y., last week has led to some speculation. The testator had the document drawn up about two months ago, when he was in good mental and physical health. He makes bequests to numerous relatives and friends, aggregating over $300,000. The schedule accompanying the will, however, contains the peculiar expression that the value of the real estate is unknown and that the personal property exceeds one hundred dollars. It was learned that the testator had formerly occupied an official position in France, and while there invented a process of making a substitute for coal, which, he believed, would eventually make him a millionaire. So sure was he of success that he returned to this country and invested all he had in a plant, that would, as he believed, carry out his design. He worked steadily on his invention for nearly ten years, and was convinced that success was in sight when he was taken ill and died. He was so entirely convinced of the certainty of his future wealth, that he dealt with it in his will prospectively, while it was yet in an embryonic state. Whether others on examining his plans will have the same confidence and carry them through to completion, remains to be seen. But the executors cannot deal with it in that way. They can only divide what they have in hand. That must always be the case with all worldly concerns; it is only in spiritual matters that there is ground for being so sure of the objects of faith that they become a present possession, being built on the unchangeable character of God.

Who calleth those things which are not as though they were. (Rom. 4:17.)

Her Beauty Fading

European journals record the death of the Baroness von Schwitzer of Roumania, a lady declared to have been one of the loveliest women in the world. She was as famous for her immense wealth as for her beauty, and she had increased her fortune by judicious investments. She had attained the age of fifty years, when she suddenly realized that her beauty, of which she was inordinately proud, was fading. She was beginning to look old. The usual appliances in such cases had postponed the inevitable period, but a short time ago she realized that their power had failed and she must submit to the fate of other mortals. After having been flattered and admired for over thirty years, the thought was more than she could bear. After brooding over it for a few days, she resolved on suicide. She made all her arrangements, and then bought a revolver, with which she ended her life. In a letter she left behind, she said she had determined not to survive her beauty. It is a pity that she had not striven for beauty of character, the charm of which increases with age. Those who make that their aim, need have no fear of surviving it though they live a century.

The path of the just is as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. (Prov. 4:18.)

stamps looked. One of them on a blue ground, with black letters, marked "Provisional" and dated 1847, impressed her most. She took the stamps to the auctioneer, who agreed with her that they might prove valuable. At the sale they were closely examined by collectors, who bid eagerly for the old "Provisional" stamp, which was finally sold for three thousand dollars to a collector from Cleveland, O. How glad the old lady must be that she saved the letters which, for far other reasons, were doubtless precious to her. The love for their writer, which led her to preserve them, brought forth unexpected fruit. So it will be with the Christian. The love which prompts him to service, brings a reward that he had not anticipated when he performed it.

Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee hungry and fed thee? (Matt. 25:37.)

Washington's Royal Blood

A discovery has been made, says the Boston Transcript, that will surprise many citizens. An eminent genealogist, named Frederick W. Ragg, has been making a search for historical purposes of some old churches and graveyards in Northamptonshire, England. There, in the ancient church of St. Leonard at Aston-le-Walls, he unexpectedly came upon evidence that is deeply interesting to American citizens. The pedigree of Washington has been traced on the male side, from father to son, to Laurence Washington of Sulgrave, who died in 1616. No one, however, had thought to trace the genealogy of Margaret, the wife of Laurence. Mr. Ragg has done this. He finds that Margaret's maiden name was Butler

CONVERSATION BY JACOB'S WELL

HE must needs pass through Samaria" (v. 4). This was not only a physical but also a moral necessity. Jesus could not go from Judea to Galilee without passing through Samaria; no more could he, because of his character and mission, fail to carry the glad tidings of salvation to the most despised of the provinces of Palestine. This is one of the significant musts of the divine character, a twin of that other Scripture, "Christ must needs have suffered." Because Christ is infinite in mercy he was compelled from within, by the moral necessity of his perfect benevolence, to come from the heavenly Jerusalem and pass through the Samaria of earthly sin and sorrow with the healing power of his teachings and sufferings. If we have "the mind of Christ" we too must minister in his name to the sad and sinful. If any man have not this spirit of Christ, he is none of his.

"Jacob's well was there" (v. 6). More than seventeen hundred years before, Jacob had dug the well, and now, when he had been long in heaven, it continued his influence on earth. When the Son of God, who for our sakes had become so poor that he could not afford to ride, was weary and thirsty, "Jacob's well was there." And inasmuch as it ministered to weary sons of men also, it ministered unto him. In the Orient, where water is scarce and wells are deep and costly, when a benevolent man seeks an opportunity to be of great helpfulness his friends say, "Dig a well." In these days, the best "wells" we can leave behind us to minister for us on earth when we are in heaven, are churches, Y. M. C. A. buildings, and other structures that will make permanent the institutions of charity and reform. Mr. George Williams, founder of the Y. M. C. A., has gone to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the high fellowship of heaven, but Jacob has no doubt said to him, "You left a better 'well' than mine, for yours ministers not alone to the body, but also to mind and spirit." If any Christian can not make a whole "well," let him see to it that he has at least placed a brick in some institution by which his "works shall follow him."

Service Asked

"Give me to drink" (v. 7). This is more than a picture of the real humanity of the weary, hungry, and thirsty Christ. He still says to every one of us, "Give me to drink," and tells us that we may do so by giving a cup of cold water to any weary and thirsty one in his name.

"How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, that am a woman of Samaria?" (v. 9). Three surprises are here: First, that a Jew speaks to a Samaritan; second, that a gentleman of that age speaks respectfully to a woman in public; third, that "the purest among the mighty and the mightiest among the pure" speaks to such an immoral woman as this. Neither race prejudice nor the prejudice of sex and class are yet obliterated, but all of them have been greatly lessened by the influence of the story of Jacob's well, and other words and deeds of Christ, and especially by the spread of his Spirit, which is embodied in that great command, "Honor all men." Even the apostles, the best men of that time, on their return with the food they had been seeking, "marveled that he talked with a woman." But it is greater cause to "marvel" that in nations which for twenty centuries have had Christ's teachings, that every man and woman is a son or daughter of God, a brother or sister of Christ for whom he died; a brother or sister of the King, and so a sharer in his right to rule; a brother or sister of every human being, to be loved and helped, not hated or harmed; so many who bear the name of Christ look with contempt on foreigners and women, especially working women.

A Test of Civilization

The estimation in which women are held is the thermometer of a nation's character. The most highly developed nations place a high estimate upon women, and in the descending scale we see half-civilized nations and savage tribes making them beasts of burden. In one nation women coal ships; in another they carry stones in baskets on their heads to build highways and are attached to plows instead of horses and mules; in still another nation they are fastened to carriages in place of horses to carry travelers over mountains, and in another nation they act as boatmen, wielding heavy oars. The estimate of woman in Europe, even in classic Greece and Rome, before Christianity leavened Europe, was similar to that which prevails in long-civilized China and India to-day.

A Message to India

"God made the world for women too," was the great watchword sent to India some years ago in a letter written by a Christian woman in the United States. The people in India who had not been influenced by Christian teaching believed that women have no souls, but that they might acquire souls by being patient wives, and so winning as a reward the privilege to be reincarnated after death as men. In such a country, "God made the world for women too" was like a bolt of lightning in the sky. It caught the attention of the people, and was made the subject of lectures and debates. The result was a very much better understanding of the rights and duties of women. "The First Sorosis of India," for knew how much deeper than your tinsel pleasures is the joy of doing good; if you only knew that I am ever beside you to be saddened by your folly or gladdened by your fidelity; if you knew that your wealth and social influence are sacred trusts to be used for the glory of God and the good of men, you would ask of me and I would give you strength, work, joy."

A lady who had gone to one of Mr. Moody's meetings, heard him say that he "pitied any man or woman who had themselves been long in the kingdom of God, and never had the luxury of leading a soul to Christ." Then she heard Mr. Sankey sing "Nothing but Leaves." She knew that she had never had the luxury of leading a soul to Christ, and up to that time had borne no fruit. She set to work, and the first thing she did was to speak to a poor sister in the street. She got so interested in that one woman, that she gave up all her spare time to the poor and miserable; until in eight years she had the names of between 200 and 300 who had been rescued from a life of sorrow. I need not say this made her one of the happiest of women.

In a fashionable party in New York, a beautiful young woman turned sharply upon an elderly dowager who was prosing about the Magdalens, and the hopelessness of doing anything for these "lost women," with the assertion, "I know a class more hopelessly lost than they—we fashionables, who murder time and squander money, and lead women to become Magdalens that they may dress like us. Why does nobody send missionaries to us?" To such, Christ is calling not only by but by multiplying opportunity; by the cries of suffering bodies and minds. "Rise up, ye women that are at ease; hear my voice, ye careless daughters." "The Master is come and calleth for thee." I covet for such that reward at last—to hear the Christ say of you, "She hath done what she could." You were created for a purpose. Are you fulfilling it? If you have no work, look for it; but not too far away, nor too high up. The young lady students at the Presbyterian College in Ottawa, Canada, learned a few days ago that a poor woman who obtained a living for herself and children by washing, was laid up by sickness; and the next morning they went to her house, did the washing and ironing for her, and sent the clothes home.

If you seek a field of labor,
You can find it anywhere.

"I perceive that thou art a prophet" (v. 19). Jesus had just shown this woman on their first casual meeting that he knew all her past life. It ought to be enough to keep every one from the most secret sin, even a solitary one, that two must know it, the man himself and God. The two most precious things are therefore lost—self-respect and the favor of God. Worse than the loss of reputation—"what men think of us"—is the loss of character—what God and we ourselves know of us. In this day, when love of money is more than ever the occasion of sin, the following story is instructive:

A Dishonest Butler

The Duke of Buccleuch bought a cow in his neighborhood which was to be driven home the next morning. Early the following day the Duke was taking a walk, plainly dressed, and saw a boy trying in vain to drive the cow to his place. "Come here, man, an' as sure's anything, I'll gie ye half I get." The Duke rendered help at once. When they came to a lane near the house, the Duke slipped away from his companion and entered by a different way. Calling his butler, he put a sovereign in his hand, saying: "Give that to the lad who is bringing the cow." He then returned to the end of the lane where he had parted with the boy, so as to meet him on his way back. "Well, how much did you get?" asked the Duke. "A shilling, and there's half o't to ye." "There must be some mistake; and as I am acquainted with the Duke, if you return I think I'll get you more." They went back accordingly, whereupon the Duke rang the bell and ordered all the servants to assemble. "Now," said he to the poor boy, "point out the person who gave you the shilling." "It was that chap there," he replied, pointing to the butler. The dishonest man confessed his fault, and begged to be forgiven; but the Duke indignantly ordered him to give the boy the sovereign and quit his service immediately. "You have lost your money, your situation and your character by your deceitfulness; learn for the future that honesty is the best policy."

"The woman saith unto him, Sir, give me this water, that I thirst not"

which the letter was written, had that sentence carved in ivory and draped in silk and hung as a motto in their club-room.

"If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith unto thee, Give me to drink, thou wouldest have asked of him and he would have given thee living water" (v. 10). I seem to see the Christ standing to-day in one of our palatial homes on the velvet carpet under the costly pictures, saying to the fashionable mother and daughter who have just come down to their noon breakfast, after their midnight dance, with no thought in their heads except of what they shall eat and drink for breakfast and dinner, and wherewithal they shall be clothed at evening for the theatre, and what romance they may read to "kill time" till then—their conversation all of matter-o'-money, of rich matches and good catches, spiced with jealousies and envies and scandals—I seem to hear Christ saying to these, "If you knew the gift of God; if you really knew and appreciated what I have done for you as women, and what I can and would do through you for other women; if you only

What the Postman Brought

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

In Convalescence

IT may interest the readers of this page to peep at the letters that came out of the postman's bag one frosty morning lately. In a family there should always be confidence, and family life goes on most successfully where the different inmates of the household understand one another and work toward a common aim. Around this home hearth of ours let us fancy ourselves gathered for the purpose of exchanging opinions and expressing our minds freely. Along in the autumn, the editor of this particular page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ventured to suggest some counsels that she supposed might be helpful to husbands and wives who needed to escape from the bondage of routine, and who failed to look as they ought to on the bright side. Just here, let us take notice that there is always blue sky somewhere. The clouds may happen to be around us, but above them there is sunshine. Let us say it over and over with continual trust, "God is good, the world is beautiful, the happiness of life far exceeds its sorrow. Come weal, come woe, we will trust in God and go bravely onward." This is digression.

To return to our theme, the advice given was widely read and has naturally brought return letters, some agreeing with it, some criticizing, and some written in frank disapproval. One friend, for example, writing from the other side of the globe, expresses her strong conviction that it is hardly worth while to tell people that they must exercise common sense, be kind and forbearing and look hopefully forward to a change for the better when times are temporarily trying. She says very truly that this remedy does not strike at the root of most human troubles, and that what we want is to be filled with the Holy Spirit and to have more of God in our daily lives. She would have tired hearts rest on the infinite love of the heavenly Father, and wandering hearts return to him.

She is right in her feeling that nothing short of heaven will ever cure the ills of earth, and that whoever drinks deeply of living waters will after that be furnished with new strength. Nevertheless, there is great occasion for the use of common sense in married life. For example, one dear wife whom I knew years ago was spiritually so uplifted above the trivial cares of every day that she never suffered herself to be fretted or worried about anything in the household routine. She spent hours in communion with God, and her face had the sweetness of an angel's, but the loaves burnt black in the oven, the boy's trousers were never patched, and her husband, the hard-worked principal of a large grammar school, used to cut out the children's frocks and aprons in the evening, and often made the beds that had been neglected all day. That the two lived together through a long life without bickering, appeared to those who knew them as great a tribute to the husband's strength and forbearance, as to the saintliness of the wife.

Far be it from me to discount the value of the spiritual life, but when a thing is to be done, pains as well as prayer are necessary.

Another letter touches a chord that vibrates to pity.

The little worn-out mother has six children who have followed each other into the world at short intervals, and another is coming. She says:

I fight against the blues with desperation, but I am so tired in body and mind that I have no courage left, and I don't know what will become of the children if I am taken from them. I wonder if it is right for a woman to have a larger family than she can bring up healthfully and cheerfully. Understand, please, that I love my children with every drop of my blood, and every beat of my heart. I love my husband and my home with unalterable devotion, but the struggle to keep alive is becoming a terror. We are poor people and cannot afford the luxuries of the rich. John says the children are our luxuries, bless them! and he means every word. But what can he do for them if I drop into the grave?

I would like to hear from the wives and mothers who are permitted a glimpse of this woman's situation what they think I ought to say to her, and I leave them to guess what I have said. Do not be afraid to han-

AFTER a patient has been pronounced out of danger; when the happy time arrives when the family cease to be on the rack in their deep anxiety; when the doctor intermits his daily visits, and the patient has turned the corner toward health, there are still weeks that are weary to a convalescent. The tide of life is flowing back, but strength does not come quite so fast as the patient wishes, and there are limitations that cannot be ignored. Friends must be guarded in their approach to a convalescent's room; they may talk too loudly, linger too long, or be too voluble in sympathy. They may indulge their desire to express sympathy by sending flowers or fruit to the sick-room, but they should be chary of going too often in person, until the invalid has regained a large measure of strength.

I remember hearing an amusing incident unknown for some hours to a family, in which a zealous colored retainer wrote in large letters and pinned to the front door of his employer's house the following announcement:

"The time for flowers is done. The time for chicken and jelly has come." Imagine the dismay with which this proceeding filled the kindred of a much beloved patient, to whom offerings of flowers had been sent until every room overflowed with them, and all the receptacles in the house had been brought into requisition for their accommodation. Convalescent days are days of thanksgiving to Almighty God. A few weeks ago one was too ill to care how the matter ended, whether death or life should gain the victory. The sick room was an arena of conflict. The patient was the gage of battle. Doctors came and went. Those who left the house to go to business dreaded what might happen before they returned, the nurse with her impassive countenance carried out the physician's orders, and in quiet corners women knelt in agonized prayer. Now all is changed. Despair is routed. Hope flashes up like a torch in the night. Joy is unrestrained. Father or mother or sister or little child, thank God, is getting well. Convalescent days are red-letter days in family annals.

A friend who has had much illness observed that she had spent most of her life in getting well, adding, "No days have been happier than those when health has flowed in like the tide after wearisome illness."

THE FEVER HEALED

He touched her hands and the fever left her:
Oh! we need His touch on our fevered hands;
The cool, still touch of the Man of Sorrows,
Who knows us and loves us, and understands.

If may be the fever of pain and anger,
When the wounded spirit is hard to bear,
And only the Lord can draw forth the arrows

Whatever the fever, his touch can heal it,
Whatever the tempest, his voice can still;
There is only joy as we seek his pleasure;
There is only rest as we choose his will.

PLAYING "GOING TO MARKET"

This is a photograph of wee Master Charlie and little Miss Ida Snyder, of Effingham, Kansas, and their team of white Holland turkey-gobblers. These gobblers have been trained to work in the harness, and they can pull a load. The younger gobbler is a year and a half old, while the other is two years and a half. Usually they are not guided by lines, but driven by means of a whip like a yoke of oxen. The children are delighted with their team and are very proud of it.

dle this subject. It is one of vital and intimate concern to woman and the home.

A girl writes that she is unable to make up her mind as to which of three suitors she will accept. Fortunate maiden! She evidently resides where womanhood is at a premium. Whether she shall marry the youth of her own age whom she favors and her parents do not, or the man a little older whom her father will take into partnership when he is married to Jenny, or the other who can at once lift her into a social position of much distinction, is the problem over which she is puzzling her pretty brow. Of course, this girl is not yet ready for marriage, as she obviously knows nothing of true love. So long as a girl can coolly balance pros and cons, so long as she shows under her soft exterior an armor of hardness, she has no right to enter the sanctuary of wedded life. Marriage without love is a desecration to woman or man. Many a young girl and many a youth play with love as children play with fire. The pastime is unworthy. The readers of this issue are invited to write freely to the editor of the Family Page, agreeing or disagreeing with her as candidly as they choose.

JAPAN FORSAKING HER IDOLS

THE ANCIENT HEATHEN RELIGION LOSING GROUND IN THE REALM OF THE MIKADO

THE cause of Christ is triumphing in Japan, and if that scientific phrase, "the survival of the fittest," has any application to Christianity, it will evidently show itself more powerful in this sphere than in any other. Who could ever be more truly "the fittest" in the social and moral scale of this country, as well as any other in need of the Gospel, than the Christ of the Christian religion? Then, too, if the regenerating power of Jesus is mainly to exert itself through the medium of his followers in accomplishing the divine purpose, there are also in this particular sufficient indications of his sure triumph. The missionary draws as mightily an inspiration from the fact of the Gospel being scattered in all directions, as by seeing sinners born into the kingdom.

Buddhism also realizes that it is ever losing ground, in some localities more than in others. Sometimes, too, the priests give the missionaries a stiff fight; for instance, canvassing an entire town, and forbidding the innkeepers or any one to entertain the missionaries who are there preaching the Gospel. This, however, is more liable to be the case in the interior. The missionary cannot help but feel, even in Japan, that he is white caps on their heads. In localities of the interior, Western music seems to have made as yet but little progress in the favor of the people. We have been with the missionaries doing Gospel work at some Buddhist festivals, where the most rustic kind of song and instrumental music was constantly heard. Even the more educated people delight to sing their poems—of which there are two sorts, with either seventeen or thirty-one syllables—to this kind of music. These tunes have often such a great variation of tone that they are beyond the pianist's skill; still, they sound rather pleasant, because sung in such plaintive minor strains.

I once opened the way for a high school principal to frankly give his opinion of Western music, by first kindly criticizing theirs. He simply answered that Western music was too noisy and devoid of variation. Even among the wealthy Japanese, vocal music is not taught, nor is it considered an essential accomplishment. But we have heard some beautiful voices here, which could be greatly used in God's service. Women usually have low-pitched voices; often one is surprised to find a woman speaking when he supposed it was a man. It is sometimes rather amusing to hear a native preacher, whom we have in mind, sing a solo in what we would call in America a "helter-skelter" fashion, without irritating one single ear, or even provoking a smile in his Japanese congregation. But for this lack he evidently makes up in his preaching, for there he is not behind the average American. What joy it brings to our minds to hear him draw the hearts of the people on the subject of God's love in giving his Son Jesus, or even in front of the greatest Buddhist temple of the city, to hear him again preach to an eager crowd of young and old on the awful example of Sodom and Gomorrah. We stand and listen as the truth penetrates the hearts, and our very flesh quivers, and we pray, "God, seal thy truth!" He has sent it, and is sending it still.

You have kindly invited us to write "concerning the work and needs" of our mission field, and it is needless to say that we highly appreciate it. However, since we have been in Japan, we have never made any public appeal for means; though we do not in the least object to others who are doing so. We are as yet doing independent work out in this remote section of the interior. A few lines from you or any of your readers would at any time prove an encouragement to us, and be highly appreciated.

Choshi, Shimosa, Japan.

MATTHIAS KKEIN.

A Workman's Rainy Day Suit

surrounded by idolatry. Millions and millions of people in the towns and villages so thickly dotted over this country, with the exception of a comparatively small number of Christian converts, are all Buddhists. Thus every family, in either house or hovel, is connected with one of the temples. Naturally, then, it is often the case that Buddhism boldly makes the missionary feel that he is an intruder, and only tolerated by the courtesy of the people. But he is happy to know that he has a heavenly commission, a fact which many mere nominal Buddhists, but earnest truth-seekers, are often willing to recognize.

Walking along the road the missionary passes a pitiful pilgrim who, in peculiar garb, wanders from one idol shrine to another. Just a mortal, seeking to quench his soul-thirst. Here again is a company of women, dressed in gayest colors, with floating ribbons. On the back of one is strapped a year-old baby, which, according to Japanese custom, has been taken for the first time to an idol shrine, as all are their first birthday.

A few doors from the missionary's home the other evening, there happened to be a funeral. In this country these are often held at night. The death occurred in the forenoon. A few priests—one particular priest clad in scarlet and gold—entered the house, and in a kneeling position chanted prayers; then, with the clanging of brazen cymbals, they came out into the dark. The chief priest's servant opened a big red umbrella about six feet in diameter, and held it over him. The friends and mourners followed the bier, borne on the shoulders of four men, and made the procession quaint-looking with their many paper lanterns.

In the larger cities, funerals sometimes are very imposing. The procession may begin with banners; then follow about one hundred or more men, each carrying in a vase a bouquet five or six feet high. After this may come a similar crowd carrying artificial flowers, and then a few large cages about five feet high, which contain a flock of pigeons to be released at the grave, with the design of accompanying the departed spirit to his abode of bliss. Then follows an elegantly adorned bier, and after it, in jinrikishas, a few musicians playing on fifes a weird funeral dirge. These may be followed by eight or ten priests dressed in their regalia, and with heads freshly shaven. Then follows a procession of foreign-dressed gentlemen, with long coats and plug hats, and lastly the women mourners in jinrikishas, with dainty

Festival Day in a Japanese Town

In Barley Harvest Time

Several interesting photographs accompanied the foregoing letter and are reproduced on this page. One of these shows a scene in a Japanese town in the interior on a festival day. The occasion was the dedication of a massive new temple. In front of the temple was a tower on wheels and gaily decorated. It was drawn by men, while a merry crowd with a band of musicians followed. Only a small portion of the thousands of spectators could be shown in the photograph. Many of them came from rural districts at a considerable distance. Another photograph shows the Japanese farmer's method of taking grain home from the harvest field, and a third pictures the odd way in which the agriculturist carries material—crops or fertilizer—to or from the fields. The workman in his straw "rain-coat" and paper umbrella (the latter oiled to shed water), seems to Western eyes somewhat poorly equipped for a wet day; but as he is seen smiling amid the downpour, he is doubtless quite satisfied with the native fashion for wet weather in rural Japan.

The Progress of New York's Rent War

AFTER a few days of quiet, which proved to be but the calm before the storm, the anti-rent troubles reached an acute stage in New York City. In a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an account was given of the unusual condition of affairs between tenants and landlords on the crowded East Side. It was expected for a few days that a general compromise would settle the difficulty, but on one day eight hundred dispossession warrants were made out and twenty-five lessees surrendered their leases. Probably, in the end, the lease system will be eliminated and the rents reduced.

Unfortunately for the tenants, the help given them by politicians of a certain class has proved a great hindrance. These politicians tried to make political capital out of the situation, and attacked the whole system of private ownership of anything and everything. The landlords, one and all, put heavy pressure on the agitators, while reducing the rents of tenants who did not want everything torn up by the roots.

On the morning the trouble was to be brought before the municipal court, over a thousand persons gathered about the courthouse. Tenants against whom the justices rendered decisions, at once went to the Socialist headquarters to voice complaints.

Red flags were displayed on the fronts of many of the tenements. The police tore them down whenever they could be reached, and at last one man was arrested for displaying the unpatriotic emblem.

By MARY McCRAE CULTER

AS the young minister sat in his study, he thought the matter over and over. He was sure that there was much in Miss Walker's words which he as yet failed to understand. Evidently she knew of evil influences which had been at work, but was unwilling to make charges against any one, preferring that he should seek for himself, and regulate future action by his discoveries. Eagerly he considered every known influence which had been brought to bear upon him and his work, but could think of no one who had shown the least unfriendliness to him, or who had seemed uninterested in the welfare of the church.

"I wish the Haywards would come home," he said. "They have been here so long, they know these people so thoroughly, and they are so anxious to help the church in every way, that I am sure I might obtain valuable help from them in identifying these people that my friend calls erasers. I wonder whether Kathleen would know anything about it. Dandy needs some exercise. I believe I will hitch him to the buggy and drive over there."

He put his thoughts into execution, and arriving at the Lawrence home, invited the young lady whose assistance he sought to take a drive with him. As they passed slowly along the country roads he repeated to her the story he had told to Miss Walker, and much of the conversation which he and that lady had held upon the subject, and found her both a sympathetic and intelligent listener.

"I have puzzled over the question all morning," he concluded, "but am no nearer its solution. Every one seems so friendly, so interested in all that concerns the church, that I cannot understand where the adverse element comes in. I have wished that the Haywards were at home, for they surely could assist me; but as they are still absent, I thought of you, and came to you for help. Have you any idea where the trouble in the church lies?"

She turned smiling eyes toward him.

"Mr. Allan," she said, "do you realize what you are asking me to do? Do you really wish me to bring a charge against another?"

"You are right," he replied earnestly. "Forgive me for the very wrongful and unwise request I made of you. I am thankful that you have been wiser than I, for your very refusal is helpful to me, showing me the mistake of the course which I was pursuing, and opening my eyes to my duty. Do you know," he said, with a smile and a sudden change of manner, "that you have proved to me that you are one of the most active 'erasers' in this whole community?"

She turned startled eyes to him, but before she could speak he continued hurriedly:

"Your whole mission seems to be to erase the unwise, unpleasant, unkind and foolish words and actions of those about you: to wipe out evil influences, that good ones may take their places; to remove discouragement and unhappiness; to cause the memories of troubles and worries to pass away, and to put courage and trustfulness in their places. This is what you do for me, O most kind 'eraser,' and I thank you for it from the depths of my heart."

CHAPTER XIII

HOLLIS MAKES A CONFESSION

AFTER an absence of four weeks, Mr. and Mrs. Hayward returned home, and a few hours later, Hollis returned from her visit to the city.

Mr. and Mrs. Hayward were in the best of spirits, as their brother's illness had been treated successfully and they had stayed long enough to see him well on the road to health, and to visit other

Hawthorne—no minister ever does—so I could hope for some better place ere long, if I were Mrs. Allan. I wonder what Kathleen Lawrence has been doing since I left. Improving her time, no doubt, and saying all possible things against me. I have been unwise not to write to Mr. Allan, for I might have kept posted, and have prevented much trouble for myself. Luckily, her school will begin very soon, and that will take her safely out of my way. Heigho! I am glad to get home once more."

Mr. Allan's welcome was quite as kindly as his farewell had been, for his mind had held only pleasant thoughts of the girl during her absence. She had been recalled to his mind many times a day by her belongings which were strewn everywhere through the house, by her silent piano, by her bird, her flowers, her hammock, her favorite chair; and that evening, the varied events of their experiences for a month were related and discussed. Mr. Allan listened intently to Hollis' vivacious account of her visit. He noted with surprise and regret that the things which she seemed to have enjoyed the most during her absence were pleasures which the spiritual-minded Christian would not have enjoyed. He was not what is called "strait-laced," but he had a distinct conviction that the Christian whose heart was set on Christ and his salvation does not need to be forbidden joining in worldly pleasures, because he has no inclination for them, nor delight in them. He believed that those who do find their pleasure in such pursuits prove thereby that they are not of the kingdom of heaven.

He was therefore astonished to hear from Hollis that during her stay in the city, card-parties, dances, theatres and Sunday excursions had been her most enchanting occupations. His surprise showed itself in his face so strongly that Hollis' quick eyes noted it; and with a pretty accent of regret, she said:

"I know that you will all think I was wickedly frivolous to do these things, and I am sure the Alison contingent of Hawthorne church would hold up its hands in horror if they could hear my story; but what else could I do? I could not be so impolite as to overturn all the daily habits and the plans of my friends; so there was no course left me but to accept their entertainment in the spirit with which it was intended, and to keep my religious scruples to myself. Honest confession is good for the soul, and I have done my duty; now you must pronounce the Absolvo te," she concluded, bestowing upon Mr. Allan her most winning smile.

"I am no priest," he answered gravely. "Only God can pronounce a true Absolvo te."

"Then you think I was inexcusably wicked?" she questioned, forcing penitent tears into her eyes.

"Oh, no," he answered quickly; "not 'inexcusably wicked,' but thoughtless; and—if I may say it—a little cowardly in not letting your friends know what you believed, and weak, in that you did not stand by what your conscience told you was right."

"Thoughtless," "cowardly," "weak," she repeated, checking off the adjectives upon her fingers. "You are the only person upon earth whom I could forgive for calling me such dreadful things as those. I deny them all. I was not thoughtless, for I was thoughtful enough to consider the comfort and the religious belief of my friends, who, by the way, are all good church members. I was not cowardly, for I told them that I would not think of doing such things in Hawthorne. I was not weak, for I did stand by my conscience, which told me that none of those things interfered with the essentials of salvation, which are, belief in the saving power of the Lord Jesus Christ, and assurance that 'he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins.' At least give me credit for remembering that much of my Bible," she ended with some petulance.

friends. Mr. Allan welcomed them gladly.

Hollis came home in a very different frame of mind from that which she carried away with her. Her expectations had been set too high, and therefore the realities had fallen far short of that upon which she had set her hopes. Her visit had been filled with all manner of excitement and pleasure, but that for which she had most hoped—the prince in disguise who was to carry her forever away from despised Hawthorne—had failed to appear, and she found herself condemned to go back to the old, dreary round, without prospect of being freed from it. She considered the situation as the train bore her swiftly toward her home.

"Mr. Allan is still there, thank fortune! and his welcome will be something worth while. 'Absence strengtheneth friendship, where the last thoughts were kindly,' and his eyes said more than kindly things when he bade me good-by. He will not stay long in many times he had wished for her lively presence. No one had spoken ill of her—indeed, if he had but noticed it, no one spoke of her at all. If she was missed anywhere, a sigh of relief was the only answer to the thought. So she came back into the minister's life with the resolve for immediate conquest established firmly in her heart.

Mr. Allan, on his part, was more glad than he had expected to be, that the family had returned. He hoped for their co-operation in the many good things which had recently been begun in the church, and was pleased to tell them of the progress he was making in winning his people's good will. Much of this shone in his eyes and was expressed by his manner; and Hollis, reading him from her standpoint, made her own triumphant interpretation. Really, he was handsomer than she had remembered him to be, and his bearing was superior to that of any young gentleman whom she had met during her stay in the city.

As the reunited family sat together

Her words produced dismay in the young minister's heart. Were these the words of a sincere Christian, of one whom he could expect to assist him in his work, of one whom he could place as a safe leader among the young people of his church, of one to whom he could turn for advice in the perplexities with which he had been dealing? His disappointment was so keen, that he could hardly find words for the answer for which she and her parents were waiting.

"Your creed and your practice do not fit together," he said. "To adjust them, you would have to make your Bible read: 'He is faithful and unjust enough to forgive us our deliberate sins.'"

"How can you be so wicked as to pervert Scripture in that way?" she exclaimed, in assumed horror.

"How can you pervert it by living that way?" he replied.

"Come, come, children!" said Mr. Hayward, "we have had enough of this bickering. There is subject enough for a lifetime of argument in the questions you have brought up. I do not believe that any of us are considerate enough of other people's consciences and really sincere religious belief. We are too apt to try to measure them by our own standards, and to condemn them unjustly. Mr. Allan is right from his strict theological standpoint, while Hollis is quite as right from that of common courtesy. Let the question go with that solution."

"Pardon me," the minister said firmly, "but I must say that the Lord Jesus Christ expects his followers to act upon a standard of uncommon courtesy; to 'offend not in thought, neither in word nor in deed,' to 'shun the very appearance of evil,' and to 'keep themselves unspotted from the world.' There can be no compromise between right and wrong. A seared conscience is as dangerous as no conscience at all. The ominous feature to my mind is that Hollis enjoyed those things. Do not deem me unkind to you when I say these things. I would be both unkind and unfaithful, were I not to say them."

"I am sorry to see that you are bound by the narrow, puritanical beliefs of Eastern theologians, and of commentators of by-gone ages. The world is advancing, ideas are changing, and we must keep pace," answered Mr. Hayward, who was evidently offended by Mr. Allan's sweeping arraignment.

"The Bible does not change, and the Lord changes not, no matter what finite commentators may say. The world is advancing—toward the Judgment Day—and we have the warning, 'Be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God.'"

"Well, well! Have it your way," said Mr. Hayward with assumed good humor. "Life is too short to waste in useless argument, and the clock warns us that it is time for all good Christians to be abed. Hollis, you will need to take a good many beauty sleeps to make up for your four weeks of dissipation. It is too bad that we wandered off into needless discussion, and wasted so much of our evening. I was anxious for Mr. Allan to tell us of the conditions in our church, and of how the work has thrived in our absence; but that will have to be deferred until to-morrow evening. Come, good folks, let us say good-night."

Dismissed in this summary manner, the troubled young minister said good-night, and went away to his room, but not to sleep. He was appalled by the revelations of the evening. Were these the people upon whom he had counted so confidently for sympathy and aid in his work? Were these the principles which he wished to have taught in Mr. Hayward's large Bible class, and Mrs. Hayward's primary department, and among the companions of Hollis? Was it the true Hollis who had spoken that evening, or was it the girl who had innocently fallen before the temptations of city life? He felt a bitter anger toward the "good church members" in the city who had led this lovely young girl so far astray. He had been unwise in his remarks, he feared, and perhaps had weakened his influence over her. He must be more guarded in the future, and strive to lead her gently back to "the strait and narrow way that leadeth unto life eternal."

CHAPTER XIV

MALIGNANT INFLUENCES

AFTER listening to Hollis' confession and Mr. Hayward's comments, Mr. Allan no longer cared to speak of his church work, and his hopes, or to ask for advice in his plans for future efforts. A deep depression had seized upon him, and he could not shake it off. To all outward appearance, the old family relations between the Haywards and himself had been re-established, but a constraint had fallen between them. Mr. Allan spent more time in his study, and there was less free, familiar intercourse.

"What is the matter with Mr. Allan?" Hollis asked of Dora Murray, a few days later. "He doesn't seem one bit like himself. He is as glum and uncommunicative as an oyster. Somebody has been spoiling him, and has been turning him against me. You should have heard the pious lecture he gave me the night I came home, simply because I let it slip that I had danced a little, and attended one or two card-parties and an opera or two while I was gone. I fairly gasped beneath the showers of his volcanic wrath. Where has he been going? Who has been talking to him?"

"I shouldn't think it necessary for you to ask such questions. Can't you guess? Who is it that turns this whole community around her little finger, and rules everything when you are away?" asked Dora with unconcealed jealousy.

"Kathleen Lawrence, of course. I might have known without asking. And what has she persuaded him to do, while I was not here to keep things right?"

"Everything that we do not want—at least, with that crowd at the head. There's the choir, first. Everybody that can't sing is in the choir, and the jumble of discords is enough to burst one's eardrums. They—that is, the Lawrence girls and Charlie Lester and Mr. Allan—have selected new song books—"

"Horrors! And I not here," interjected Hollis angrily.

"—and the choir meet every week for rehearsals. They have organized a Christian Endeavor Society, with Charlie Lester at the head, and Grace Alison for vice-president—think of that! If you want to be popular you'll have to go regularly to prayer-meeting. It's quite the thing to be there, and in the front seat, too. You see, they use the choir rehearsals as an attraction. There is only one advantage in the new arrangement, and that is, Miss Tilly don't get to torment the deaf old people with her attempts at music."

"I suppose Kathleen thinks she has fairly caught Mr. Allan?" Hollis inquired wrathfully, persisting in the personal aspect of the change.

"You'd think so too, if you'd been here to see. It's a pity Dandy can't talk. He could tell you lots of things that you'd be surprised to hear."

"Dandy! Has he been using my horse to take another girl riding? He'll never do that again. He can go to the livery stable and pay for his rigs hereafter."

Disastrous Lacks in the Home

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

TWO sermons, in which I have expressed my ideas of the best foundation for a happy Christian home, have already appeared in these pages.* I would continue the subject here, because in the building of a Christian family, as in the building of a mansion or a store, care is needed in putting up the superstructure after the foundation has been well and truly laid. I would remind my readers of the ground already covered: The necessity of the home having from the very start a religious basis; of the head of the family having some method of daily recognizing the need of divine guidance, and of guarding the evening hour from intrusion from outside.

I go on to speak now of certain safeguards, the lack of which tends to bring disaster on the family. Incidentally I may call attention to the danger of over-indulgence, the giving to a child expensive toys and apparatus which fill the place that ought to be filled by his own ingenuity. We supply them too much, and do not leave room for their spontaneity. Another necessity is that the child recognize parental authority. It is well to argue with a child, to show the reasonableness of what is required of him, rather than to beat him, but he ought to understand that if we fail to convince him, he must yield to our authority.

Let us now consider five common lacks in many households, which although in themselves perhaps small, when summed up as a total, account for much failure in making the home what it should be. The first of these lacks we will call

A Lack of Comradeship

This lack of comradeship may be true of the husband and wife. It may be something which started from the beginning. It is not an insurmountable difficulty. People who have very little comradeship to start with can acquire it by mutual concessions and the willingness to adapt themselves to each other's peculiarities. But the most serious lack of comradeship is that to be found between parents and children. The father becomes immersed in his business, his politics or his sport and after a while ceases to be a playfellow. In many families there is an utter lack of this spirit which tends to knit the relationship, and between brothers and sisters there is sometimes an utter absence of comrade spirit. I think where it is lacking, owing to distinct and opposite characteristics, it may be cultivated and made possible by a mutual willingness to make advances and a mutual forbearance.

The second lack is a lack of humor. There are very many good people in the world who never have any fun within the family circle. Everything is staid and decorous and proper. It is always dignified and as it should be; but the hard places in the household life, the little annoyances, the disturbances which if begun in too serious a spirit result in bitterness and grave trouble, might in many cases be dispelled in a moment by the spirit of humor. I do not mean simply "good humor" or "good nature," but simply the spirit of good fun which will not permit any member of the household to magnify a comparatively small affair. Many children could be laughed out of a bad habit quicker than they could be whipped out of it.

The sense of humor in the family is like oil on a squeaky hinge or on a rusty journal. It is the lubricant of daily life. Very many things become too serious simply because they are treated too seriously, and without meaning to, we over-emphasize the little troubles and worries of life, and they become after a while the big things which we first imagined them to be. Do not check the happy laughter of the child and kill out of its budding life the sense of fun which God placed there.

A Lack of Patience

The third lack is the lack of patience. I do not mean indulgence. Every child knows the difference between patience and indulgence. Losing one's temper never benefits either the one who loses it or the one who finds it. Many otherwise good households are in a wrangle more or less of the time because of the hasty word, because of the outspoken thought, because of the egotism which cannot endure. "Love beareth long and is kind. It endureth all things." We need to have more patience with one another in all the walks of life, and in none more than in the home circle. It is a strain on the human affections and the human feelings for people to live together all the time. The constant rubbing together of those who are compelled to live under the same roof will provoke hatred or dislike if there is a lack of kindness, and a forgiving spirit which overlooks and keeps still and waits.

A Lack of Memory

The fourth lack is a lack of memory on the part of the grown-up members of the family. Fathers and mothers, older brothers and sisters, forget many of the experiences of their own childhood. Most of us, probably, if we stop to think, can remember when we did the same naughty things our children do. We can recall being irreverent; we can recall the time we forgot; we can remember the day we ran away and went contrary to the explicit command not to do so; we can recall cases where we were hateful; when we nearly broke mother's heart doing the very things she told us not to do. If there is any man or woman here who cannot remember doing some of these things, that man or woman is an exception to the rule. When we chide our children for these things we ought to remember we did the same ourselves, and perhaps more than they ever do. I do not mean to say that the memory of these things on our part should take away from our obligation to warn or rebuke or teach, but it should make us more thoughtful, and should also make us more hopeful for our children.

The fifth lack is a lack of plainness of teaching. Many things which are left for the child to learn through its own experience or through the conversation of other children or by the painful process of learning it through sin, ought to be imparted by the father and mother. The plain things in regard to the child's body and its functions which are of the most vital consequences to its development should not be withheld. I believe the child can be taught how its body is made, and what the different parts of the body are for; what is the meaning of each part of the body; what are the consequences of wrong-doing; and the healthy child will respond to this knowledge and act upon it in such a way as to be spared much suffering. If any one is going to tell our children concerning the things which have to do with their physical life, surely the fathers and mothers have first right.

He threw the paper to the floor, a faint tinge of color spreading over his sallow face and showing through the thin straggly whiskers. With a high keyed nasal snarl he said: "It just makes me scotching mad. I'll never buy or have to do in any way with an article or thing using the name of a Biblical character, so there."

"That seems to let out a man with my name," his brother "Benjamin" remarked, while his round, ruddy, smiling face showed the value of a sweet and natural disposition, contrasting strongly with the ultra religious and fanatical brother, always on the lookout for trouble.

That evening at dinner Ben suddenly stopped his skinny brother as he started to bite into a piece of delicious "Angels Food." Some one at the table took up the water pitcher and asked him if he would have some "Adams Ale" androlley poley. Ben prodded him with:

"I suppose you will have to go to the doctor and have your 'Adam's Apple' cut off if you want to be consistent, and of course you will have to give up your trip to St. Augustine this winter. Think how awfully it must grate on the nervous people who have to live in St. Paul, Los Angeles, and other places innocently carrying Biblical names."

"And think again of the thoughtless and sacrilegious persons who erect buildings of steel made in 'Bethlehem,' Pa."

You can never have the healing help of "St. Jacob's oil." Never see a foot ball game played by the "Sons of Eli," never sail on the steamer "St. Paul" and never taste "Elijah's Manna."

A lot of good things in this world take their names from the Bible.

It is truly a mark of respect to name a good article after a good man.

MORAL.—Genuine piety respects the prophets and the worthy people, places and things named after them.

Sixty Years an Evangelist

IN Folkestone, England, there has just passed away a veteran evangelist, John Maxted, who for many years was superintendent of the great cluster of missions sustained by the late beloved Christian millionaire merchant and statesman, Samuel Morley. For many years I watched John Maxted's career, loved to associate with him for his beautiful spirit, and honored him because of his heroic life of faith. His career was one of romantic realism. Like the late sainted George Muller of Bristol, he endeavored consistently to "live by faith on God alone." Born in London, Maxted was converted at fifteen, while listening to an earnest sermon by Archbishop Tait. The young convert began to preach at sixteen, and never ceased to proclaim the Gospel till the very close of his life at seventy-six. He responded to a call to settle for a time in a fishing community on the coast of Cornwall, near Land's End. He had no fixed salary, and literally lived by faith. Very often he and Mrs. Maxted had not a penny, but subsistence never failed. Food, clothing, and money would come in answer to prayer. After a few years he moved to London, and in that city carried on a mission amongst the masses for several years. He refused to accept a regular salary.

The Late John Maxted

When Samuel Morley was at the height of his prosperity he built a beautiful chapel in the village of Leigh, in Kent, fifty miles south of London, and requested Mr. Maxted to come as pastor. The evangelist consented and soon the mission began to ramify until there were branch chapels erected in twenty-one villages, and no fewer than seventeen missionaries were employed as assistant evangelists. A wonderful work went on for seventeen years. Robert Moffatt, the Apostle of South Africa, had in his old age retired from the foreign mission field and returned to spend his last days in his native land. Mr. Morley gave the great missionary a pretty cottage to live in, and here Maxted often visited him, and the two became loving friends.

Mr. Maxted was next called to Folkestone, where his work lay among soldiers, sailors, and fishermen. He was specially dear to the children of the poor, who attended his funeral in great numbers, and wept tears over their loss. The poor loved him dearly, for he was ever ministering to the needy. Many in England are mourning the loss sustained by his death. He had a large family of sons and daughters, some of whom are actively engaged in Christian work.

WILLIAM DURBAN.

The Talk by the Well

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

JESUS was weary. "In all things made like unto his brethren" (Heb. 2: 17), "in all points tempted like as we are" (Heb. 4: 15), Jesus knew what physical weariness was. There are temptations peculiar to fatigue. It tends to induce fretfulness, self-occupation, self-pity, especially where it is accompanied with sharp pangs of pain. But how did Jesus deal with fatigue? He did not urge himself on to needless exertion, but when his disciples went away into the city to buy meat he quietly took the opportunity to rest by the well. Yet no sooner did something come before him which his Father permitted, than he accepted it at his hands without question. There was a soul to be won. A woman of Samaria came to draw water, and "Jesus saith unto her, Give me to drink." It was a simple request from a tired stranger. But Jesus met with a rebuff: a heartless, unnecessary, unwomanly rebuff: "How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria?" It was true that Jews had no dealings with Samaritans, but it was also true that kindness and sympathy for those in need should overstep national distinctions.

The woman did not know to whom she was speaking; she did not know the world's Master was before her; he who had said: "If I were hungry I would not tell thee; for the world is mine, and the fulness thereof" (Ps. 50: 12). She did not know that he had more to give her than she could have to give him, but he "said unto her, If thou knewest the gift of God [see John 3: 16], and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink, thou wouldst have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water."

Oh, how the world faints for want of the living water—"the Spirit, which they that believe on Him should receive" (John 7: 39). How many prayers are dead, powerless prayers for want of the Holy Ghost! How many Christians, even, live lives which are a mere drag of wearying effort to keep right, for want of the Holy Ghost to dwell in them and reveal Jesus in them! Our blessed Lord knew that he alone could reveal to this sinful woman her own state and her deep need. She said: "Sir, thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep." Oh, what a revelation was there to her, and is there to all who receive His truth, in the words: "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again; but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." This was something of which she had no conception.

The Samaritan woman "saith unto him, Sir, give me this water." She spoke in deep ignorance; her conceptions were all earthly; her only idea was, "that I thirst not, neither come all the way hither to draw" (R.V.). She wanted to be saved trouble and fatigue, and would make use of Jesus to serve her purpose. Oh, how many there are who would like to have the joy and peace which Christians have, while they still cling to their sins! They would like to have as much religion as would serve their purpose and minister to their own selfish life. But Jesus came to save us from our sins; to give us happiness.

Some Esperanto Doings

THERE are now about 700 societies in all parts of the world organized for the study of Esperanto. Above 3,000,000 of people are interested in the movement.

At the Esperanto Congress recently convened at Cambridge, England, there were present representatives from thirty nations. At the opening session of the Congress, the mayor and mayoress both addressed the meeting in Esperanto. At one of the committee meetings, Professor Mayer, Professor of Latin in Cambridge since 1872, made his first address in Esperanto. He is 83 years of age. A Bible translation committee was appointed.

Esperanto is working its way into many lands. In Frankfurt-on-the-Main in Germany, there is an Export Journal; in Geneva an International Scientific Review; in Paris an International Social Review; the Espero Pacifista, organ of the International Peace Society, also in Paris. In Japan, India, and South America, Spain and Portugal, there are Esperanto publications, not to mention those in England and the United States. Many Esperanto Circles are now being formed by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the study of the new language. Circles should have six or more members including a chairman (or chairwoman) to lead in the lessons, and a secretary. Esperanto primers and vocabularies will be supplied by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at ten cents each, where desired.

Mr. Edmond Privat, one of the leading Esperantists of Europe, is now in the United States. Mr. Privat is the Honorary Secretary of the Esperanto Congress and an officer of the International Esperanto Society. He is now delivering addresses on the new language to clubs, societies, colleges, institutes and other organizations. Any group of Esperantists desiring to have Mr. Privat visit them and lecture, may arrange for a meeting by addressing him in care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York. As he is exclusively engaged in this work, it is necessary in such cases that his traveling expenses should be defrayed by the organization inviting him. He will answer communications, and will be pleased to give counsel to any who desire to extend the knowledge of Esperanto, by forming circles in towns and cities, or introducing the study in colleges and schools.

A Moonlight Reverie

IT was not then a poet's dream,
An idle vaunt of song,
Such as beneath the moon's soft gleam
On vacant fancies throng;

Which bids us see in heaven and earth,
In all fair things around,
Strong yearnings for a blest new birth
With sinless glories crowned;

Which bids us hear, at each sweet pause
From care and want and toil,
When dewy eve her curtain draws
Over the day's turmoil,

In the low chant of wakeful birds,
In the deep, weltering flood,
In whispering leaves these solemn words:
"God made us all for good."

When one by one each human sound
Dies on the awful ear,
Then nature's voice no more is drowned,
She speaks and we must hear.

"DEFECTIVE HEARING"

Unseen

Comfort

A. O. LEONARD
ANTISEPTIC

I was deaf for thirty-five years

My Invisible Antiseptic Ear Drum (which I patented July 3rd, 1906) and my method have restored my hearing. Since I put it on the market last February, it has restored the hearing of hundreds of others, many of whom had given up all hope of ever hearing again. It has also relieved many from distressing head noises. I have just gotten out a new Ear Drum that is a great improvement over my original Drum. The megaphone principle and the flat-sounding membrane make my drum the most successful device on the market. Do not confound this Drum and my method with any failures you may have tried. My Principle is different; my method is also different, and they are the most successful of anything offered for aid to Hearing. It is "Unseen Comfort." My new method and antiseptic Ear Drum are endorsed by leading physicians. Absolutely out of sight when worn. The price is very low. Why not have your hearing restored? Let me write you about it. I do not make absurd and impossible claims. I will give you facts only and will not exaggerate.

MISSION CLOCK FREE

I have received a few thousand magnificent 8-Day Mission Clocks to distribute free. I will give you the opportunity, if you write at once, of securing this prize without one cent of expense on your part—only a little work in my behalf.

This is the genuine Mission Style Clock that you have heard so much about. It is nearly two feet high, solid and substantial throughout. Cathedral chimes tell the hour and half-hour in sonorous tones. The hands and figures on the dial are polished brass and it is a perfect time-keeper, with a timed, tested and regulated EIGHT DAY MOVEMENT.

This is not a cheap clock but is the latest up-to-date, mission style, the same as you will find in the homes of the wealthy and well-to-do people everywhere. It is a clock you can put in your parlor or sitting room and be proud to show to your friends and neighbors. It is a premium worth getting, for a clock is something you can always use and this clock is not only useful but also a handsome addition to your parlor or sitting room and will last a lifetime.

This Grand Clock is absolutely free to any lady or anybody who will show my special offer among her friends and neighbors and get only 20 to accept it at 25c each and send me the $5 collected. All I ask is that you do this little bit of work for me, which will require but a few moments of your time and immediately upon hearing from you with your remittance, I will not only send you the clock absolutely free, but will also pay the freight charges to your town, so that it will not cost you one cent of your own money, even for charges. I want to get my special offer introduced in every town in the U. S. as quickly as possible and am giving this grand present as inducement for your prompt assistance. Let me send you my free outfit anyway, also a great, big illustration of the clock, which will give you a better idea of just what it is. I will send everything prepaid, so that it will not cost you one cent to try and if you do not care to accept my offer, you can return the outfit and no harm done. Be the first person in your town to secure this Grand 8-Day Mission Clock. Write me about it today. Address

Teddy Grunts Like a Live Bear

Movable Arms and Legs

3 BIG PRESENTS FREE TO GIRLS

This beautiful bisque doll is nearly half a yard tall, has beautiful curly hair, big blue eyes which open and shut, is magnificently and fashionably dressed and a large hat, and has shoes and stockings that can be taken off and put on, so that you can play with this doll just as if it were a real baby.

This is also a wonderful talking doll and says papa and mamma plainly and distinctly. The big blue eyes, the pretty hair, the peaches and cream complexion cheeks and the little rose bud mouth makes this the handsomest and dearest doll you could imagine, and I want every girl to get one free.

I also give a 27-piece China Tea Set consisting of 6 cups, 6 saucers, 6 plates, teapot, sugar bowl, cream pitcher and 6 spoons. It is not every girl who has a set of dishes for her doll, but I am going to include this handsome little set with every doll. The set is beautifully decorated like the real china in the large sets costing many dollars.

And I am not going to stop here, but I am also going to give a real, genuine, big, brown shaggy Teddy Bear, with special movable arms and legs, so that he can sit up, lie down, stand on all fours and be placed in all sorts of comical positions. By just giving him a little squeeze he makes a funny grunt that sets everybody laughing. You can have more fun with Teddy than anything you ever owned. This is the real Teddy Bear, girls, of which you have heard so much. Some girls prefer a Teddy Bear to a doll, but I give both.

BIG FREE TALKING DOLL

BIG FREE, SHAGGY GRUNTING TEDDY BEAR

To any little girl (or big girl either) who will show my fine offer among her neighbors and people in her vicinity and interests only 12 persons in my special offer at 25c each and send me the $3 collected. You can do this slight service for me in two hours' time. I don't charge you anything for my outfit, as I send it free, and you can try and see what you can do, and if you can't very easily do the work on my plan there is no harm done. However, I know any bright girl can earn these presents without any trouble whatever. Just think, you get a big handsome doll, a grunting Teddy Bear and a 27-piece tea set and 6 spoons all for this little work. It is the most generous offer ever made, and every girl reader of this paper should write to me at once and get my full instructions and outfit, and then just as soon as you do the little service I require, I will send you the Doll, Teddy Bear and Tea Set and Spoons absolutely free. I arrange to pay express charges, so they will not cost you a penny.

I GIVE ALL 3 PRESENTS FREE!

Throws 60 Large Beautiful Pictures In Color

FREE OFFER TO BOYS

This magic lantern is complete in every detail including a special large reflector, curved Russia iron chimney, non-explosive lamp, and fine glass chimney. It has two special strong telescopic lenses, so that the pictures are brought out large and clear and distinct. I also include 60 pictures, all different in colors, and an instruction book, telling how to get out an entertainment and how to make a lecture. You can have an entertainment, make an lecture, or use it for a school, and charge an amount of fee.

The Magic Lantern alone would be a big present for the little service I ask. I am also going to give this Handsome Spy Glass with which you can have a barrel of fun, as you can see objects far in the distance with it, also look at the moon, stars, etc. This spy glass is a good article, handsomely made with good magnifying lenses, entire length, 6 1/2 inches. It does not cost you one cent, but is given free with the lantern as an extra inducement. I give both this great Magic Lantern outfit and fine Spy Glass to any boy for whom someone has collected the 25c. I have ten machines and get them to accept it at only 25c each, and send me the $2.50 money. It costs nothing to try, as I send you outfit and full instructions without a cent in advance, and you can return it if there is no harm done. The boys everywhere are delighted. The magic lantern and the spy glass are magnificent presents, so why not get them as long as they will not cost you one cent of your own money? I ship the lantern and telescope, express charges paid in advance, so they won't cost you a cent, even for express charges. Send your name and address at once and I will send you my free outfit, all charges paid, immediately upon hearing from you. Write today.

Questions and Answers

H. S. Cornwall, N. Y. What kind of a society is the one known as the Leptans?

It is or was a communistic organization, founded in France in 1840 by Etienne Cabot. In 1848 an advance party went to Texas and settled in Fannin County. The remnants of this colony joined another settled at Nauvoo, Ill., in 1849. In 1854 they removed to Adams County, Ia., where they had purchased 3,000 acres of land.

J. N. Warren, Ill. Where and when was David Crockett born, and from what nationality was he descended? On what occasion did he say, "First be sure you're right, and then go ahead"?

David Crockett was born in Limestone, Tenn., in 1786. He was descended from Scotch ancestry. In the Creek war of 1813-14 he commanded a battalion of mounted riflemen under Gen. Andrew Jackson. He was a congressman in 1827-31, and 1833-35. He subsequently took part in the war of Texan Independence. He was killed when the Mexicans stormed the Alamo, March 16, 1836. "Be sure you're right, then go ahead," was his motto, and he is said to have often repeated it.

Mrs. J. L. R., Auburn, N. Y. Why cannot Universalists be admitted as members of the Y. M. C. A.?

We are not aware that they are discriminated against, because the Y. M. C. A. is liberal in its methods, and the presumption would be that the Universalists could unite as well as others in Y. M. C. A. work.

Mrs. H. M., Pleasantville, Pa. Does temperance work hinder church work? Please answer through the columns of your excellent paper and oblige a reader.

No. On the contrary, it is a very important part of the work in many churches and should be so in all.

Reader, Greenwich, N. Y. Where do goldfish come from?

They are golden carp and were first imported from China to England in 1691. By 1723 they had become quite common in Great Britain, but of course were kept in small aquariums.

R. B. C., Sashburn, Sask., Canada. What is the correct English pronunciation of Esperanto?

All four syllables are pronounced as written: Es-per-an-to, with accent on the third syllable.

F. G. M., Cornwallis, Ore. What is the beast described in Rev. 13? How is the number of his name reckoned?

John foresaw an impending persecution of Christians by a despotic tyrant who should arise in the last years of the dispensation. He describes him as a beast or monster, having seven heads and ten horns. This creature or demon-inspired man is mentioned in other parts of Scripture. Our Lord is supposed to refer to him in Matt. 24:15 and John 5:43. Daniel is very explicit (Daniel 7:19-21; 8:9-12). Paul calls him the man of sin (II. Thess. 2:3). The persecution to be inaugurated by him was to be greater than any the world had known, and was to continue three and a half years. Commentators are not agreed about his identity. Some say the prophecy was fulfilled by Antiochus Epiphanes, but it could not have been entirely fulfilled by him. The majority of commentators think he is a prince resembling the great Napoleon, who is still to arise. The number in his name mentioned in Rev. 13:18 refers to the numerical value of the letters in his name, according to the system still used on the dials of watches and in dates, in which X stands for 10, V for 5, etc.

H. L. P., East Point, Ga. 1. About what time were the first coins made in the United States with the motto, "In God We Trust"? 2. When was the first money coined by our mints without the motto? 3. Does any other country or nation have this or a similar motto on its coins?

1. The motto first appeared on our two-cent piece in 1864. In 1866, it appeared on the following coins: Double eagle, eagle, dollar, half dollar, quarter dollar and five-cent piece. The trade dollar, which appeared in 1873, also bore the motto. 2. The first United States coinage was the half dime, a few of which appeared in October, 1792. 3. Some British coins have the words "Dei Gratia" (by God's grace) before the sovereign's name.

Reader, Barborton, O. When one has been betrayed by another, after the most solemn promises of fidelity, is it a duty to forgive?

Your question is too vague to give ground for a positive answer. It makes a difference whether there has been repent-clearly in I. Corinthians 2:14, 15, where the words, "the natural man," stand for the soul of man. Thus the heathen have souls, but their spirits have not been quickened into life. The close relation of soul and spirit is implied in the passage by the separation mentioned.

B. M. B., Montgomery, N. Y. Of what country is the mignonette native, and who named it? I find it does not stand transplanting well.

The mignonette is a North African plant, but is now cultivated in many lands. The name is French, but it is not known by whom it was first given. Peter Henderson in his Handbook of Plants, says the mignonette does best in a cool climate.

C. L., Livingston, Tenn. What does the expression, "without the gate," in Heb. 13, refer to?

The place of execution, as outside religious observance, social respect, the privileges of the covenant people. To the Jew an expressive phrase, indicating the ex-

B. C. 5, that Joseph and Mary in obedience to it, went to Bethlehem and Jesus was born.

T. J., Ada, Okla. Under what conditions can a boy enter West Point Military Academy and Annapolis Naval Academy?

The candidate for West Point must be between seventeen and twenty-two years of age. He must pass an examination in reading, writing, spelling, English grammar, English composition, English literature, arithmetic, algebra through quadratic equations, plane geometry, descriptive geography and the elements of physical geography, especially geography of the United States, United States history, the outlines of general history, and the general principles of physiology and hygiene. The Academy will accept in place of the foregoing examinations a certificate of graduation from a public high school or State Normal School or a certificate that the candidate is a regular student of an incorporated college or university. A physical examination is required. You can get information about the examination for appointments from your Congressmen. Candidates for the Naval Academy must be between sixteen and twenty years. The regulations regarding times and places of examination and the examination subjects may be obtained from the chief of the Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

An Anxious Manitoba Reader. Excellent courses in domestic science are given at Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, N. Y., and at Simmons College, Boston, Mass. Drexel Institute is in Philadelphia.

Reader, Grand Isle, Neb. The object of the battleships' voyage has already been repeatedly explained in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is taken for the purpose of practice for the fleet, and also as a demonstration to the nation of the necessity for defending our Pacific coasts.

A. U. T., Avalon, Pa. Marconi and DeForest both invented systems of wireless telegraphy, the former, we believe, having his system first in the field. We are unable to answer your question in regard to the wireless telephone. Ask the manager of your local telephone company.

A. C. S., Trenton, N. J. The mere enclosing of return postage in a letter cannot reasonably be expected to assure you of an answer. Otherwise, all sorts of people with all sorts of questions might easily consume the whole time of any person they might address. The writer who sends return postage, if he be a sensible person, should understand this.

B. F. F., Wisconsin. Admiral Evans actively participated in several naval battles during the Civil War and was four times wounded. In 1891 he was in command of the American squadron at Valparaiso during the trouble with Chile, and acted with a promptness and tact that won admiration. He commanded the Jowa during the battle off Santiago de Cuba in 1898, and helped destroy the Spanish fleet.

An Appreciative Reader

Dear Dr. Klopsch: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a valuable magazine to me. The literary skill with which it is written is educative. Your premiums are certainly judiciously selected. NIELS NIELSEN.

A Funeral on the Ice, Among the Wends of the Spreewald, Germany

IT is not an unusual sight, in winter, in certain parts of the world, to see a whole funeral cortege on the ice. Among the Wends, a remnant of the ancient Slavonic race inhabiting the Spreewald (a region enclosed by an arm of the river Spree, about fifty miles south of Berlin), almost all the traffic is carried on waterways. In winter, funeral processions pass along on the ice. The coffin is carried on a sledge and is drawn by six mourners, who wear long black streamers on their hats. The whole company goes on skates, the women wearing the ancient national costume.

ance and a desire for forgiveness. It also makes a difference what form the betrayal took. Was it a personal injury to you, or was it a failure to fulfil promises of self-reformation? Christ's teaching is to forgive injuries though it may be seventy times seven times that the offense was committed (see Matt. 18:21, 22). If the difficulty is of a brother who has fallen, by all means forgive and help him to rise again. Our own experience teaches us to be patient and magnanimous. We hope that God will forgive us many and grievous sins. Forgiveness of injuries, however, does not require you to place yourself in a position in which the injury may be repeated.

E. A. N., Ogdensburg, N. Y. The reference to the Word of God in Heb. 4:12, implies a difference between soul and spirit. What difference can there be?

The soul in that passage represents the affections, desires, the principle of animal life and action. The spirit stands for the higher life by which men seek after God. You will see the difference stated more tremity of abomination. It was the place where the offal of the sacrifices was burned. The writer implied that the followers of Christ must be prepared to go with him to the utmost humiliation.

M. J. B., Bridgewater, Mass. Is there any mention in history of the decree of taxation mentioned Luke 2:1?

There is a record of such a decree in Suetonius and on the Ancyran monument, as having issued from Augustus in 726, 746, and 767 in the Roman era, which dates correspond with B.C. 28, B.C. 8 and A.D. 13. The second of these dates is obviously the only one that could be identified with the one mentioned by Luke. It is doubtful, however, whether that decree applied to the foreign provinces. Nor do we know when the decree would reach Judea. Tertullian says it was executed by Saturninus. He was governor of Syria at that time, but it was near the end of his term, so he may have begun the enrolment, leaving the completion of it to his successor Varus. There is now little doubt that it was near the end of the year 749, or

TWO SULTANS IN MOROCCO

MOROCCO, for a country of its size, has managed to take up a large part of the world's attention during the last two or three years.

The Algeiras Conference was so important that a diplomatic misstep might have caused a sanguinary conflict between two European Powers. Then Raisuli, the famous insurgent, came out of his fastnesses again and spread terror to the very walls of Tangier. The new international force under French officers did good work, and then there was a lull, followed by the Moorish attacks at Casa-Blanca. Now the country, not having had trouble enough, has got two Sultans, Muley Hafid, the half-brother of the legitimate Sultan, Muley Abdul Azziz, having declared himself ruler and gathered a powerful military force of insurgent tribesmen. The regular Sultan, Azziz, was born in 1878, and came to the throne in 1894. At that time Morocco was comparatively quiet. There were small insurrections and numerous raids by bands of robbers, but these have always occurred for years in the country and did not disturb the serenity of the Sultan. The people as a whole were favorably disposed towards him. After a few years they began to hear disquieting rumors about their sovereign. It was said that Azziz had become imbued with European ideas, and intended to live after a new fashion and not according to the unwritten rules that had been followed by his ancestors from time out of mind. It was discovered that the Sultan was taking a practical interest in machinery and had established workshops on European patterns.

Some time later the Sultan became interested in photography and cameras of all shapes and sizes were brought to the royal palace. This filled the orthodox followers of Mohammed with horror, for, according to their beliefs, it is very sinful to make pictures of the human face or form. It is noticeable that in all Moorish art this law has been religiously carried out. While the artist has worked wonderful designs on shields and on vessels of copper, and decorated most elaborately the walls of mosques, the human face and figure do not appear. As the Sultan is the head of the Mohammedan religion in northern Africa, the break with tradition was all the more marked. The Sultan photographed his wives, his ministers of State, and gallant Sir Harry Kaid McLean, his general, who did not care, as he is not a Mohammedan, but a Scotch soldier of fortune.

Foreign agents were quick to send to the palace new inventions for the Sultan's inspection. The bicycle had an especial fascination for him, and he ordered several dozen of different makes. In a few days after the first machine arrived, Azziz was an expert rider and was speeding about the courtyards and through the corridors of his palace. He found it such an enjoyable pastime that he ordered his attendants to learn. He would sit for an hour or two at a time, in a gale of merriment, as he watched those dignified sons of the desert try to mount and ride their new and unruly steeds of steel and iron. When a rider came to grief the Sultan snapped his camera and had a picture of the accident to show to the unfortunate bicyclist the next day.

The people of Morocco are fanatical followers of the old regime, and the power of Azziz became greatly weakened, especially in the interior. He was extremely fortunate in having as commander of his army Sir Harry McLean, a soldier of remarkable ability. McLean served in his early days in the Sixty-ninth Regiment of British foot at Gibraltar, but the service there did not offer him the wide field of opportunity he desired, so he resigned and entered the service of the Sultan of Morocco. As long as he was in command the Sultan did not fear for his throne. Several months ago, however, McLean was captured, and from that time the Sultan has had hard work to hold his own.

Raisuli's forces increased daily, and then came the announcement that the Sultan's half brother, Hafid, had declared himself as the real ruler of Morocco, and that his brother was an enemy to the country and to its sacred traditions. Muley Hafid is yet an unknown quantity in a great struggle between modern and ancient ideas. He has not yet proved himself a general.

The ultra-religious Mohammedans have flocked to the insurgent standard in large numbers, and he now holds a large part of the interior of the country. Foreign troops are of little avail against him there, as they are unsupported by their ships. Azziz seems to have thrown off some of his lethargy, and is determined to make a stubborn fight for his throne. Several engagements have been fought with varying success. The Moors fight well; the result often remains long in doubt if both armies are equal in numbers. In the battles that have occurred the Sultan's troops have fought doggedly through the onward rush of the tribesmen, as they dash in on their wild chargers, with white bournouses floating in the wind; and the line, lighted with the glint of steel scimiters, while the ground shakes with the beat of thousands of hoofs, is a sight that would appal all but the stoutest hearts.

Relying on the bayonets of his infantry, Azziz is still Sultan according to international law. To-morrow, the tide of irregular cavalry may have swept over the fez-topped lines, and Muley Hafid may reign within the walls of Tangier.

Sultan Muley Azziz on his Way to War

BRAZIL'S FAREWELL TO THE FLEET

NO country could have shown itself more friendly to the United States than did the sister republic of Brazil during the stay of the battleship squadron at Rio de Janeiro. Both officers and men had been led to believe that they would receive a warm welcome, but the hospitalities extended were on such a scale that all expressed their surprise and pleasure.

The day before the ships weighed anchor, the officers of the fleet gave a reception on board the battleship Minnesota, as a return for the many courtesies they had received from the Brazilians.

Over three thousand guests came in response to the much coveted invitations. The decorations were designed by the famous naval artist, Henry Reuterdahl, who is, by special permission of the navy department, the guest of the fleet during the entire cruise to the Pacific. He arranged a fountain on the main deck, and the guests were delighted to see gold fishes swimming about in the pool of water. Great wreaths of flowers were hung on the guns, and festoons hung from stanchion to stanchion. The flags of Brazil and the United States were intertwined and placed in effective positions. Diving suits were arranged in a decorative way as if they were suits of ancient armor. The officers and men were in full dress to receive the guests and the handsome uniforms of blue, laced with gold, added greatly to the effect of the picture after the ladies arrived in gowns that were in the latest mode from Paris. The Baron de Rio-Branco gave a banquet in the evening to Irving B. Dudley, the American Ambassador, and the officers of the fleet. The Baron pledged the friendship of Brazil to the United States and after praising the Monroe Doctrine, to which all South American countries owed so much, he referred to the fact that his country had been one of the first countries to endorse it after it had been promulgated by President Monroe.

The fleet had been ten days in Brazilian waters, when the signal to sail was hoisted on the flagship, and the ships headed out to sea for the next lap of their journey to Punta Arenas. Over 300,000 persons came down to the waterfront to bid them farewell. Every boat that could be hired, begged or borrowed was pressed into service to take out people for a nearer view of the departure. President Pinna went in his yacht to Fort Villegagnon and reviewed the fleet as it passed out. The crews manned the rails, and the handsome flag of Brazil was flying from the mainmast of every American battleship. Sixteen Brazilian warships acted as escort to the Americans. It was an even greater spectacle, with thirty-two vessels, than the sailing from Hampton Roads.

PABLO, THE FILIPINO CONVERT

DURING the early months of the missionaries' work in Cebu, in the Philippines, when the workers were frequently stoned, our brave little group of Filipino and American Christians had many a testing time. All services had to be conducted in the open air, because no house for Protestant meetings would be rented to the missionaries. It was a pretty severe trial for native women and men to stand up and testify for Jesus Christ in those days. Yet the privilege of speaking at such services was much appreciated.

In the midst of those days of severest persecution one of the volunteer workers had pressed upon him the bribe of $2,500 to give up preaching the Gospel. He chose unhesitatingly to remain in his poor little native home with his old mother and his wife and children, rather than sell his privilege of telling his people about his new-found Saviour. This choice was made at a time when one villager, who had attended the open-air preaching, was killed by his fellow towns people on his return to his home, for no other reason than that he had listened to the Protestant's preaching.

Even in the face of such trials, the simple preaching about the Saviour and his teachings attracted in the first few months many earnest native workers.

One man, Pablo Diaz, found out through a friend that he could hear the Bible read if he would go to the meetings. He belonged to a distant part of the Philippines, and had not seen his parents and people for many years. He came to the meetings, and what he heard there about the Saviour, he longed to be able to tell his own people. Pablo's work took him away outside the city to the mountain villages and the small towns. On his return from these trips, he would tell his friends how God had protected him while he told the distant people about Jesus being the true Saviour. One morning after his return from a journey, on presenting himself at the city office where he was employed, he was informed that his services would no longer be mistake, and he was fully vindicated. But he now had no desire to give up his work as evangelist to his people. Nor had his missionary friends any desire to lose him. In response to a plea from a missionary stationed in Pablo's far-off province, he and his wife and their two little daughters, whose names in English mean "Light" and "Gladness," went there. He had gathered around him in his mission at Albay a band of faithful Christian natives. As we journey back across the great Pacific to the Philippines, one of Pablo's first missionary friends writes you this little story of how God brought this Filipino servant into the mission field.

In some three weeks, we hope to be sending a message to Pablo of the good news about the Mission Boat, which, if sufficient funds are now coming in for its fitting up for the tropics, will shortly be on its way to spread the Gospel among the hundred islands of our Cebu field. G. WHITE JANSEN.

Help the Mission Boat

The work of equipping the Mission Boat, El Heraldo Cristiano, for service among the hundred islands which constitute Missionary Jansen's parish in the Philippines, is now approaching completion. Many friends have sent contributions to aid in equipping the boat, and it is hoped that many more will soon do likewise, and that it will be in condition to be forwarded early in the spring. Readers of this journal are invited to share in this worthy enterprise. The little motor boat will be a most valuable aid to the band of workers at Cebu, doing away with the use of native canoes, which are slow and dangerous. Every contribution for the Mission Boat sent to this journal will be acknowledged in these columns.

required. He went to the missionaries to tell them of his trouble. They advised Pablo to go on teaching the people about the Saviour, and said that they would provide for his support. Some time afterward, facts came to light which showed that Pablo's discharge had been ordered through a

FOUR YEARS AMONG THE TIBETANS

The Veil Lifted from the Mysterious Land, and Its Inner Life Laid Bare

A Tibetan Prince in State Chair

BEFORE leaving for India, at the close of a recent vacation, the Rev. J. J. Lucas, of Allahabad, left with the editors of this journal a remarkable book, written by an educated native of India, Rev. Ahmad Shah. The author describes his experiences during a four years' sojourn in Tibet, the "Sealed Land," concerning the laws, people, religion and customs, of which comparatively little is known to the outside world.

Ahmad Shah journeyed in 1894 from Agra, India, through Cashmere and thence to lower Tibet. He experienced many of the inconveniences and a good deal of the opposition of which white travelers write. While he was stopping at Leh, on the borders of Tibet, he had the good fortune to meet a Tibetan, a kushuk (dignitary) of the first rank, who ruled over a monastery in Lhasa, and had 5,500 monks under his authority. His name was Lub-zeng Namhgail. He was totally ignorant of either Isa (Jesus) or his mission on earth. The Tibetan Buddhists had no knowledge of the Gospel.

The kushuk explained to the traveler that the Grand Lama's reason for excluding foreigners from the "Sacred City" was that the judicial authority was vested in the kalouns (priests), and they believed that as soon as foreigners entered, they would lose their power, and famine and pestilence would follow. This popular belief was based on a prophecy uttered by the Grand Lama "in a former existence." The Tibetans believe firmly in reincarnation.

In March, 1896, the kushuk prepared to leave Leh for Lhasa. He said the Lamas were preparing for a great war to save the Sacred City from a foreign invasion. The Grand Lama had spies everywhere along the border. Although Ahmad Shah was greatly disappointed at the time, as the kushuk had promised to take him to Lhasa, he succeeded, nevertheless, in crossing the frontier some time afterward and spent four years of his life among the people of Tibet, in closest intimacy with them. He observed all their habits of life and thought, and pictured many interesting phases of Tibetan character in his albums. He sketched them at work at their various industries, and pictured the artistic products of their most skilful artificers in gold, silver, iron and other metals. He drew their temples, lamas (priests), and sacred images; their high officials, their tradesmen and agriculturists; their devil dancers and "mummers," or religious character actors; and he pictured them at their feasts, their weddings and their funerals. For the first time, he revealed to the world the real life of the high-class men and women of that mysterious country whose gates have been so asteries arose all over the land. There were long periods of strife, the monarchical line constantly becoming weaker. About the eleventh century the powerful influence of the Lamaists was established and the country gradually became a theocratic monarchy.

Wars and invasions followed each other in the succeeding centuries, and Tibet was more than once subdued and compelled to pay heavy tribute to its conquerors, but at last China confirmed the Dalai Lama in the supreme authority, which continues to the present day. He is supposed to be an incarnation of Buddha.

tightly barred against foreign intrusion. In the printed story of his four years' life in Tibet, he has given several hundred of these instructive sketches.

But although Ahmad Shah traveled over a large part of Tibet and tried to penetrate into Lhasa, he was no more successful than other strangers in his attempts to explore the Sacred City. He spent months in a vain effort to enter it, and at last was fain to abandon an attempt which in all probability would have cost his life.

Fourteen hundred years ago, as he learned from the historical sources encountered in his travels, the Tibetans were a race of cannibals, practising devil-worship and magic, and offering human sacrifices to appease their cruel gods. About 600 A.D. the land (which was then called Bodh-land) came under a monarchy, the ruler being a fugitive prince from India. This form of government lasted 400 years. Buddhism, arithmetic, science, and medicine were brought hither from China. The first great Buddhist or Lamaist was Thumi Sambotha, who came to be regarded as an incarnation of Buddha. Soon mon-

When the Grand Lama dies, his spirit, the priests say, enters into a child. The child so chosen, when he reaches his fourth year, is duly proclaimed as Grand Lama. A regent rules until the new Lama is eighteen years old. His cabinet consists of four ministers called kalouns, who are elected for life and are the real rulers of the nation. They are assisted by sixteen lesser officers, four controlling the army, four civil affairs, four revenue, and four the laws and justice. Every village is governed by a lama, who is supreme in spiritual and religious affairs, and by a gyalpo, who has charge of the local secular administration. Below these, in turn, are lunpos (local governors), mak-porns (military officials), chazgots (revenue officers), and shaksporns (local justices); and there is a host of subordinate officials, including masters of horse, police, petty magistrates, etc.

Political influence dominates everywhere and the struggle for office, large or small, is continuous, and often involves bloodshed and bribery. There is no regular army, but in times of necessity the Lhasa government can call upon every family to supply at least one soldier. Their weapons are antiquated, including matchlocks, bows, arrows, and shields.

Laws are swift and unyielding. Every village has its executioner. The worst offenders of either sex against morality are branded on the forehead. Many of the punishments are extremely cruel and inhuman.

Tibet is a comparatively infertile country, and its present population of 5,000,000, Ahmad Shah believes, is all it can support. It has plenty good grazing land and vast mineral deposits wholly undeveloped. The people are of the same stock as the Chinese. They are hardy, homely in features, avaricious, dirty in their habits, easily contented, merry-hearted and cheerful and rather dull intellectually, with ideas of virtue and morality very different from our own. Northern Tibet is largely peopled by nomads, and the south by a settled population. They have castes, but the restrictions are few and not so rigid as in India. They dress simply, using skins and furs liberally. The poorer dwellings are huts of mud, stone or brick. Sheep and cattle raising is the chief industry. All their labor is simple, yet the technical arts have advanced among them, and some of the work of their skilled artisans is wonderfully good. Commerce is usually by barter, although money is gradually coming into circulation.

They give gifts at births, marriages, and deaths, and on the arrival and departure of guests. Everybody drinks tea, and also chhang, the national beverage. Women have absolute social freedom, more perhaps than anywhere else in the world. They go about unveiled, work with men in almost all callings, and practise polyandry, many women having as many as four husbands. When a separation

Lord Minto's Message

IN view of the many alarming rumors of impending famine in India, notwithstanding the recent rains, and in order that the true situation might be ascertained from an authoritative source, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent a cablegram to the Right Hon. Earl Minto, Viceroy and Governor-General, inquiring as to actual conditions and proffering aid in relief work if needed. The following reply was received by cable:

"Calcutta, Jan. 24.

"LOUIS KLOPSCH, Bible House, New York.

"Most grateful for generous offer. Will distribute any help America sends, but distress not yet so acute for appeal to her liberality. Letter follows.

(Signed) Viceroy."

This reassuring message from Lord Minto will be welcomed as a relief by many thousands of Americans and Canadians who are interested in missionary and humanitarian work in India.

Pensioning Our Ex-Presidents

REPRESENTATIVE BARTHOLDT of Missouri has introduced a bill in Congress that is worthy of the most careful consideration by the law-makers at Washington. The bill provides what may be called a pension for ex-Presidents of the United States, while they are at the same time to serve the country with their experience in an international capacity.

The ex-Presidents during life, the bill provides, are to be delegates to international conferences at The Hague, and to all Pan-American conferences. A salary is attached to the office of international delegate, and allowances made for the pay of clerks and for traveling expenses.

The idea is an excellent one. No man could be better fitted to sit in international councils than one who for four or eight years had been dealing with questions of State and with the relation of his own land to other countries. In the presidential office the delegate would have received a training that could be had in no other way; and the opinion of an ex-President would carry weight with the delegates from other countries.

Our ex-Presidents have not been aged men when they retired, but men to whom years of usefulness remained. Nevertheless, the public desire for new idols has often caused them to be forgotten as if they were men whose life work was done. While most of our Presidents have desired a period of rest after retirement from office, the duties in the present case would not be of such a nature as to be a great tax upon them.

Few of our Presidents have been wealthy men, and the demands made upon their purses during their terms of office have given them little chance to save for the proverbial rainy day. The salary attached to the office proposed would allow them to live in dignity after their active service to the State. There would never be enough ex-Presidents to make the money spent a burden on the public treasury. We pension admirals and generals; why not allow something toward the support of the Executive, who has been their official commander-in-chief for a time? It is not pleasant to think, as has been written of one former President, that he who had been the foremost citizen, and had given his best to the country and people, had to raise chickens for a living when his term of office had expired.

Our Esperanto Circles

STUDENTS of Esperanto, who are becoming familiar with the new language through the Complete Course of Lessons now running in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be greatly interested and encouraged by the article contributed for this issue by Mr. Edmond Privat, a brilliant young Esperantist, who is acknowledged throughout Europe as one of the foremost exponents of the "universal language."

Mr. Privat, who comes from Geneva, Switzerland, was Secretary of the Second Universal Esperanto Congress, and is now visiting this country for the first time. He is especially interested in the progress of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Study Circles, and his active co-operation will be a valuable assistance to all who have taken up the course. He may be addressed in the care of this journal.

Esperanto is just beginning to be known here. As Mr. Privat very clearly shows in his article, there are golden opportunities in store for those who attain proficiency in the language, as it is doubtless destined to be generally taught in our American cities, and teachers will be in demand. The opportunity afforded by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Course is one that should be seized by thousands of intelligent and ambitious readers throughout the country.

Japan's Recognition

WHEN the generous American people came to the assistance of the people of Japan during the famine in the northeastern provinces of that country several years ago, they made THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the channel of their benevolence. We were glad to serve in so worthy a cause. The relief then organized and conducted was greatly appreciated by the Japanese government and people. Lately, however, this appreciation took an unexpected form, when the following official letter, in Japanese characters, was received through the Japanese Ambassador in this country:

Human Vivisection

SINCE the remarkable statement of Professor Osler, several years ago, that the average man had ended his best work at forty and was thereafter of doubtful value to the community in the sense of contributing to its enlightenment or happiness, probably nothing has excited more varied comment among the scientists than the startling proposition of Dr. G. H. Quay, a Cleveland physician. Discussing the subject of vivisection at a recent meeting of medical men, Dr. Quay made the suggestion that offenders convicted of a capital crime, instead of being subjected to electrocution or hanging, should be turned over to surgeons and bacteriologists for vivisection in the interest of science and for the benefit of society. He went still further and urged that all habitual criminals, instead of being made a public charge, should become subjects for the vivisectionists. So barbarous and inhuman a suggestion has met with the reception it deserves.

The trouble with Dr. Quay and men of his stamp is that they fail to apprehend the true office and object of the law with respect to criminals. Laws are twofold in their nature: they are both punitive and reformatory; and we believe that the tendency of our modern Christian civilization lies most largely in the latter direction. The poorest use to which a man can be put, however worthless he may be, is to kill him. Besides, it should not be forgotten that the criminal is the result of abnormal social conditions, for which society itself is to a great extent responsible. He is the victim of heredity and environment. When the true reformation comes, society will purge itself from the bottom upwards, and crime will diminish in proportion as beneficent laws make provision for the education and uplifting of what is now known as the criminal class.

Under the Federal Constitution, cruel and inhuman punishments are expressly prohibited.

We trust the day may soon come when the States will enact laws forbidding the vivisection of the lower animals, which, as now practised, is a system of pitiless and wholly unnecessary torture. If Dr. Quay's outbreak should focus public attention upon this degrading abuse and lead to its reformation, it may, after all, produce a good result.

Early Religious Training

WE are constantly confronted by contrasting aspects when we consider early religious training. Roman Catholics claim that they seldom lose a child from their fold, for the reason that the church has set its seal in an ineffaceable impression on the infant mind before it has reached the age of seven. What is taught to a child in baby days and in the first seven years is likely to stand by that child for the rest of its life. On the other hand, there are very many thoughtful people who think, or act as if they thought, that it is unfair to bias a child before it reaches a period when it may choose for itself. They therefore leave the virgin soil untilled, and since they do not sow the good seed of the kingdom, Satan is very ready to scatter therein his evil weeds.

Still another view is shown by those austere Protestants who, in their conscientious effort to train up a child in the way it should go, succeed in making religion a gloomy and prison-like thing from which the man escapes into freedom with a sense of having borne the yoke in his youth. An extreme instance of this was some time ago shown by Augustus Hare in his brilliant but pathetic autobiography, entitled "The Story of My Life," and it has lately been repeated in a very frank book written by the famous essayist and critic, Edmond Gosse, in which he narrates a large part of his childhood experience. His father was a man of learning and large gifts, but the severity of his piety and its bigotry swung the son in the other direction, and made him look upon evangelical religion as necessarily a thing to be dreaded.

Where lies the truth about early religious training? Should it not be carried on side by side with the rest of education on the principle that our relation to God is not that of bond-slave to a dreaded master, but of sons and daughters to a tender and loving father? Little hands should early be folded in prayer at the mother's knee. The Sabbath, so far from being a day full of restrictions, should be a day of pleasure and privilege, the very happiest day of the entire week.

Far more by example than by precept are children trained in piety. A young girl said that she had always looked in reverence at a certain door in her home, the door of a little upper room. "Mother used to go there when she was tired or perplexed, and she always came out with a face as calm as a summer morning. Even as a very little child I knew that mother went there to talk with God."

To make piety dismal is a crime. If our religion is genuine it should be cheerful.

Plymouth Church's Historic Windows

EIGHT beautiful memorial windows were recently unveiled in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn. They constitute a new departure in church decoration. Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, the pastor of the church famous through the world as the scene of the labors of Henry Ward Beecher, in dedicating the windows, explained the principle on which the new departure had been made. He believed that the time had come to register in church windows the story of God's providence. What God thought it worth while to do, it was worth the church's while to celebrate and remember. Some had limited the subjects for church windows to the age of prophets and apostles. No man could over-estimate the importance of such recognition through ecclesiastical art; but the time had fully come for the widening of thought. Dr. Hillis said: "When I proposed these windows setting forth the immanence of God, the continuance of his loving providence, and asserting that God is pouring out his spirit upon all flesh through the Puritans, some men called it sacrilegious. But when a long time has passed, the storm of controversy and criticism will die out of the air. Men will understand that the setting forth of what God did for our fathers does not deny what God did also for the prophets and apostles. It rather supplements and completes the story. Once medieval art was bound in grave-clothes. When liberty to choose new subjects came, the renaissance of art came also. Is not God pouring out his spirit upon American artists? Has not the era of conventional angels, and conventional prophets, and conventional apostles about passed? . . . Men will yet realize that there are no better themes for stained glass, in solemn aisles and glorious windows, than the themes of modern liberty, religious and political, where God hath made known his will to men. In the full confidence of a new era of art in our chapels and libraries and churches, we have assembled this day to celebrate the completion of this work, setting forth the influence of Puritanism upon the people and institutions of the republic."

The series of windows depicts the history of Puritanism and of the Pilgrim Fathers from the rise of the movement. Beginning with the appeal of John Pym and John Hampden to Charles I. of England on behalf of political liberty, it proceeds to the plea of John Milton for intellectual liberty. The next subject is the famous interview between Oliver Cromwell, the great Protector, and the Quaker George Fox, whom he had released from prison. Then coming nearer to the American settlement, the subjects change to the Pilgrim Fathers and John Robinson's farewell prayer. Then the signing of the historic compact on the Mayflower, the seed-corn that was to ripen into the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. The sixth topic in historic order is the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, Mass. The seventh represents John Eliot preaching to the Indians, and the eighth the founding of Harvard College twelve years after the landing of the Pilgrims.

Thus the line of God-fearing heroes, who, seeking religious and political liberty, came here to dedicate their lives to the founding of a new country, is appropriately commemorated in the windows of a church consecrated to the service and worship of God, whose providential dealings are thereby recognized.

These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. (Heb. 11:13.)

Entombed Forty-five Days

The experience of the three miners rescued on January 19 from the Giroux Mine at Ely, Nev., will not soon be forgotten in that State. They had been down a thousand feet below the surface for forty-five days, and had almost abandoned hope of rescue. There had been five men down on the level when the mine caved in, but two were killed in trying to escape. The other three men were in the pumping station and were almost suffocated with the dust that forced its way in. They quickly realized that their only hope of being kept alive until rescue could reach them lay in a six-inch water pipe connecting with the higher levels. Through this they were able to communicate with the surface, and compressed air and water were sent down to them. Provisions were also sent and they were encouraged by the assurance that all that could be done to rescue them would be done. They found an old saw in their cave, with which they made themselves bunks out of part of a wagon, which saved them from having to lie on the damp floor. Food was sent to them regularly and such comforts as could be passed through the pipe. They say it seemed an interminable time before rescue came, but they knew that a large force of men would be needed, and that they would have to work at the constant risk of their lives. They were sure, however, that the work would be done willingly, and that they would be saved if it was possible. They could never have saved themselves, but they owe their lives to the men who, at the peril of their own lives, went to save them. It is so that the whole human race has the opportunity of escaping eternal death. Unhappily the deliverance gained in that case, however, is missed in many instances, because after it had been won at the cost of the life of the Deliverer, many men do not avail themselves of it.

Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life. (John 5:40.)

Love Letters in a Tree

In the hollow of a tree cut down recently near Richfield, N. J., two letters were found bearing a date twenty-seven years ago. One was in a woman's hand and had evidently been written to a lover after a quarrel. The writer was sorry and did not shrink from saying so. She was quite ready to make up, and if he also was willing, he was to meet her near the tree on a certain evening. If she found that her letter was gone and he did not meet her, she would conclude that he was angry and would not be reconciled. That was the substance of the letter which was signed "Alice." With it was a letter in a man's hand addressed to his dear Alice, telling how he had been time after time to the tree hoping to find a letter from her and had been disappointed. He could not understand her silence, but was forced to believe she no longer cared for him. He would wait a few days longer, but if there was no letter in the tree then, he would conclude it was all over between them, and he was her true "Jim." The mystery of the letters was revealed by the woodcutters. There was an opening in the trunk of the tree about five feet from the ground. Squirrels had bored a hole up the trunk and had taken the letters to make their nest. Each of the correspondents, finding the letters gone, supposed that the other had taken them and by not replying indicated continued alienation. If each had but known how the other longed for reconciliation, how different their lives might have been! There are some who are kept away from God by the same misconception. The mission of the Gospel is to tell them that God loves them and desires them to be reconciled to him.

As though God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God. (II. Cor. 5:20.)

A Noble Porter

The proprietor of the Hotel Astor in New York has just learned, to his amazement, that one of his employees is a member of an ancient Hungarian family of historic fame. He is known among the hotel employees simply as Franz. He is a good-looking man of thirty-five, with straight black hair and a clear-cut profile. For three years he has been employed by the Hotel Astor. In all this time there has never been a suggestion of his lofty birth. The story of his relationship to Charles, Prince de Trauttmansdorff-Weinsberg, leaked out in a curious fashion. Throughout the man's service at the hotel he has made no friends. In the servants' hall, where he ate, he held aloof from the other employees, and went silently about his work, which he performed with scrupulous care. Another Austrian was employed by the hotel last summer. It was this man's duty to act as helper in the pantry and clean the silver plate. He decided to return to "the old country," and hearing that Franz was a Hungarian, asked him some questions about certain cities in Austria. Franz was able to give him information so detailed as to arouse the suspicion that he was of high rank, and one day he made an excuse to go to his rooms. There his suspicions were confirmed by seeing a baptismal cup and other articles bearing the name of the Von Trauttmansdorff family. He taxed Franz with being a scion of the house and the charge was admitted. He said he had quarreled with his family and preferred to work hard for poor wages, than to apologize and return. How many men there are in similar relations to their heavenly Father! They might be living in quiet under his sheltering care, but are held back by pride, and are suffering loneliness and spiritual poverty.

When he came to himself he said, How many hired servants of my father have bread enough and to spare, while I perish with hunger! (Luke 15:17.)

A Modern William Tell

A press dispatch from Goldsborough, N. C., to the New York Times, reports an act as critical as that of the mythical Swiss hero. A man was approaching his home when he saw a strange commotion in his garden. As he came nearer he perceived, to his consternation, a huge eagle rising in the air with an infant in its talons. He knew well enough that it was his own baby son. The weight was almost too much for the bird, and it rose slowly. The distracted father ran to the house and snatched up his rifle. He knew the risk he ran of shooting his own child, but trusting to his marksmanship he fired, and had the gratification of injuring one of the eagle's wings. That proved to be better than killing the bird, for it descended slowly and reached the ground without dropping the child. Another well aimed shot killed the eagle, and the infant was found to be unhurt, the talons of the eagle having torn only the child's clothes. Had the father been a less skilful marksman, the infant must have perished. There are few parents who need to guard their children against such a peril. They do need, however, to guard them against a more subtle antagonist who is more to be dreaded:

Be vigilant, because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour. (I. Peter 5:8.)

HEALING THE NOBLEMAN'S SON

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

BEHOLD a sorrowing father. What matters it that he is a person of high social and official rank, a nobleman? He is grieved at heart because his son is sick, and likely to die. Such sorrow knows no distinction. Quite probably it was his only son. The whole household was in distress because of the impending death. All means used for the restoration of the sick son had proved ineffectual. And then the father was willing to listen to the suggestion that he should ask help of Jesus Christ. This was urged upon him because of the many wonderful things Jesus had done in Jerusalem. The nobleman accepted the suggestion so fully that he determined to go himself and personally ask the help of Jesus.

An Urgent Plea

How anxiously the father pleaded with Jesus that he should come down to Capernaum, and heal his son! "Sir, come down ere my child die." We can see him earnestly pressing his hands together, as if to emphasize the request. Jesus saw him, and heard him, and entered into his sorrow, but declined to go to Capernaum, knowing that his word had power to heal. And so he simply said to the father, "Go thy way, thy son liveth." It was probably about seven o'clock in the evening, according to the Roman way of reckoning time. The burden was lifted from the father's heart, because he believed what Jesus had said to him, and he went away.

The early morning hour found him and his servants riding with all speed toward Capernaum. Instead of their dejected appearance of the day before, their whole being, as they pressed their mules forward, bore evidence of high hope. They were nearing home, and were beginning to descend to the Sea of Galilee, about one thousand feet, when the nobleman saw some of his servants coming to meet him. They saluted him with the glad tidings: "Thy son liveth." And when they came near and their master could talk with them, he asked them at what time he "began to amend?" And they answered that the fever had "left him" at the seventh hour. The father remembered that was the hour when Jesus had said: "Thy son liveth." The servants had all unwittingly repeated the very words of Jesus. Then the rejoicing father hastened on, and when he reached his home there was great gladness, and all in his household joined with him in praising the name of Jesus for what had been done. In a legend we are told that the nobleman was Chuza, Herod's steward, whose wife afterward, out of gratitude for the restoration of her son, gave food to Jesus and ministered to him and his apostles with other women, when they journeyed from place to place in their work of teaching and healing.

Precious Opportunity

"After two days he departed thence." Jesus had been but two days in Samaria, but it made a difference to hundreds for eternity that Jesus of Nazareth had passed by, and they had heard and heeded his message, sent them through the woman he had saved—a difference also to hundreds of others who had heard but did not heed the good news that a Saviour was near. We might well put on our watches the motto of an ancient clock, "On this moment hangs eternity."

"Went into Galilee." Galilee, as well as Samaria, was a land of the lowly, despised by the more cultivated people of Judea; but Jesus found there a greater welcome than in Jerusalem, one of many illustrations of the fact that pride is a greater barrier to truth and penitence than vice. The publicans and sinners were nearer the kingdom of God than the Pharisee. "The Galileans received him," but "he came unto his own and his own received him not."

"There was a certain nobleman whose son was sick." Neither rank nor wealth can bar out sickness or sorrow. It is said that King Oscar's recent death was hastened by deep sorrow, because Norway had been lost out of his double kingdom. He had lived a noble life, had been a good and beloved king. Dr. Clark, of the Endeavor Society, had secured his hearty endorsement of the movement to secure a treaty of all civilized Powers to protect the uncivilized races against the white man's rum and opium. But he felt like one bereaved of a son in the loss of Norway, which succeeded for reasons that did not at all reflect on him. Scarcely less than to homes of the poor come sorrow and anxiety to the homes of wealth. Having more at stake, they are more anxious about the morrow; and the sons of wealth are, in their very abundance, subject to the temptations of luxury that the poor escape. Oh last week. What do you think of that?" The missionary replied, "I think you robbed some poor wife and children by your unlawful gains. But, friend, I want to ask you

A Solemn Question

"Which book would you have found upon you at death, your betting book or the Bible?" In a subdued mood the gambler turned away. They met the following day. The gambler opened the conversation. "I have been very unhappy since I saw you yesterday. You upset me by what you said, as to which book I would rather die with." "Tom," said the missionary earnestly, "God's Spirit is speaking to you." "Yes, it must be God. I never felt like this before." "Well, now, Tom, what are you going to do? Which is it to be, betting book or Bible?" Tom sat very still for fully two minutes. Then he looked up with a smile. "Bible," said he in a loud voice. Tom did nothing by halves. He destroyed his betting book that very day, and commenced to read his Bible. Among the betting men he is now a power, asking them the same question.

"The Nobleman saith unto him, Sir, come down ere my child die" that boys and girls might realize that sin makes more sorrow than sickness! Christian parents experience their keenest pain when the moral nature of a child is sick.

The Hidden Drain

A mother expressed to the family doctor her anxiety because in a new house, on high ground facing the south, chosen to improve her children's poor health, they seemed to grow no better, but rather worse. At last a garrulous old man in the neighborhood, when a little coffin had been carried from the house, said: "What about the old drain that runs right under the house? The contractor just covered it up and the new inspector inquired naught about it. It was not my business to speak, but, seeing the little coffin, I could keep still no longer." So in many a boy's life, in many a man's life, there is an old drain that is poisoning the moral nature, putting the soul in a coffin. That is a thing to be anxious about. Let us ask Christ's help to remove these deadly drains that poison body and soul for both worlds.

In this story the son was "at the point of death." That is a place where sin reveals itself in its true colors, and where the Bible and Christ are seen in their true value. In a London street, a rough man said to a city missionary, "I do not want to listen to your Bible; this"—holding a betting book aloft—"is the book for me. This pays best. Your book is too old. It is out of date. I made £12 by this book "Besought him that he would come down and heal his son." Here is one of the many cases of answered prayer when Jesus was upon earth. People in need of help for body and soul came to Jesus and he answered their spoken or unspoken desires by giving them what they asked or something better, at a better time and in a better way. All this should help us to understand prayer. We should come to the invisible God in the same way. The miracles are parables of prayer. And they teach us that God answers prayer, but that he sometimes answers No, when that is the best answer loving wisdom can give.

An Instance of Faith

"Except ye see signs and wonders ye will not believe." Translated into modern life, this means that many a man will not believe he is saved or his child is saved unless he has been through religious convulsions. That is not faith, but sight. As all the apostles, save Paul, became disciples by quietly accepting Christ's call, "Follow me," and as this anxious father believed his boy was saved on the word of Christ, "Thy son liveth," with no other proof; so real faith, without any "feeling," believes that God will keep his part of the great contract in I. John 1:9: "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

To a boy, who had accepted in full faith this promise, an old elder said, when he had presented himself for church membership: "Do you cherish a hope that Jesus Christ has forgiven your sins?" "I know he has," said the boy promptly and cheerfully. The elder looked to his fellow elders with misgiving at such assurance, and then said to the boy: "How do you know that Christ has forgiven your sins?" "Because he said he would." The story has been told before, but is worth repeating as a perfect parallel in the spiritual realm, to the story of the saved boy in our lesson. Christ saves the souls of boys to-day on the same faith in parents that he saved theirs of old. Only where Christ would save the soul, the boy must also "believe and receive and confess him."

Accepting the Promise

One of the missionaries of the Children's Special Service Mission of London, which is devoted to saving boys and girls, especially of the so-called "upper classes," who often are in the greatest need of a missionary, had invited Ernest Grierson to breakfast, that he might help him to be a Christian, having noted his eager face in the back of his audience of boys for several days previous. After breakfast, the missionary said: "Now, my dear boy, are you one of God's children, or do you want to be?" Ernest flushed. "I think," he answered quietly, "the latter part of your question seems to apply to me best." "You want to be God's child? Well, how do you suppose you can obtain that wish?" "I suppose by doing one's best," he answered at length. "I doubt," said the missionary thoughtfully, "whether any man ever does do that, until he has the Spirit of God within him. He does not know what is the best possible, and he certainly cannot attain to even second best in his own strength. The fact is, you really expect somehow to save yourself by good works?" Ernest looked up. "Yes—I suppose I do." "Well," exclaimed his friend, "I have a glorious message for you. The work is done. Christ cried from the cross, 'It is finished!' And so it was; and all you have to do is to accept the fact with thanksgiving." "But haven't I to do anything?" "Nothing to get eternal life. Plenty as a result of it. The recruit in the army is a soldier when he enlists, but then he has much to do and to learn." "Thank you. It seems to me I have to accept the fact that he died for me, just as I accepted your kind invitation to breakfast this morning." "That is it! I said 'Come'—and you came and proved I meant it. Christ Jesus says: 'Come unto me.'"

A Blood-stained Bible

"Thy son liveth." Whenever this lesson is taught the story should be repeated for those who have not heard it before, of the Christian American soldier killed in the war for the Union, who was found on the field of battle with his Testament in his pocket, in which the words, "Thy son liveth," were framed in his heart's blood. The sorrowing parents cherished this message as a reminder that he had so lived that he could never really die. "He that believeth hath everlasting life."

The Ideal Bible

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I received the new small Red Letter Bible, and find it in every respect as advertised. I have for many years sought for a small limp Bible containing the helps, concordance, readable type, but never succeeded in finding one till I received yours. Am highly pleased with it, and do not see how it can be sold for the price.

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

"Bargain Day"

ON certain days the great department stores in the big towns allure customers by what are called bargain days. The bargains are sometimes in one article, and sometimes in another. Whatever goods are selected for bargains are marked down from the original price to a much lower figure, and one who walks through the aisles of a shop at such a time may see women crowding about the counters and bearing off with great delight the prizes they have secured. In point of fact a bargain is often a disappointing affair. It may very well happen that the purchaser had no occasion to procure that special thing, and would never have missed it if she had overlooked the advertisement in her reading of the morning paper.

Said one lady to another, as the two sat side by side in a ferryboat: "Everything is at present so cheap that I feel it a positive duty to go to town at least once a week and buy as many things as I possibly can."

"Yes," said the other, "a good many people feel that way; but I have noticed that the husbands and fathers are looking anxious, and I have been wondering whether it is not a mistake to let one's self go hunting for bargains."

The bargain counter possesses an attraction all its own; yet, on closer inspection, it may be discovered that some of the goods upon it are a trifle shopworn or a bit out of date, or in some way do not measure up to the exacting standard that the fastidious consumer or purchaser prefers. We are, by the way, in this rather lavish country, ignoring the value of small savings. The customer whose shopping is ideal fits her purchase to her want, and seldom buys wares that are cheap, unless they happen to meet her precise need. In the end she is the gainer. At the same time, it may be conceded that there are women of good judgment who, from time to time, almost casually pick up what they call excellent bargains. Those, for example, who buy dress goods, or stock their linen closets at the close of a season, may have less variety from which to choose, but as the merchants are clearing out their goods to make room for a new supply, there are often desirable values to be had for a little ready cash. Those who would possess themselves of bargains in this way must economize at other times, so that they may have in hand the wherewithal to pay at once for what they buy. Few bargains in reality fall into the laps of those who purchase on credit, and, finding a charge account convenient, in the end are surprised at the amount which it reaches in the course of a single month.

In buying for the table, it is infrequently safe to rely upon bargains. As a rule, in the purchase of foods that are not perishable, it is wisest to buy in as large quantities as can be accommodated in the family storeroom. The contracted quarters in which the city householder must often live, oblige the purchasing of food in smaller quantities and for daily use. The frugal housewife may guard against waste by good management. Such an economist knows to a fraction how much tea, sugar and coffee, flour, butter and meat she will need in a week, and she goes to market and to the grocery with an exact list. In her economy there will generally be found no waste and room for a little margin. Bargains will not tempt her.

The Length of School Sessions

Five to six hours a day spent in the schoolroom by children between eight and fourteen represent the length of the ordinary school session, broken perhaps by a short recess in the morning or afternoon for the younger children, and by a longer or shorter spell at noon. That growing children should have so little time out of doors for healthful play in the sunlight and

Temperance as a Safeguard

NOT a great while ago the announcement was made as an item of news that twenty-five thousand men employed on railroads had signed the pledge of total abstinence from liquor, the reason being that when hands were discharged discrimination was made against those who were known to be even moderate drinkers. Railroads and steamboats are very unsafe when left to men whose keenness of eye and ear is dulled by drink. The vast crowds of passengers who constitute the traveling public have a right to demand strict temperance as the rule for those who are charged with transporting them from place to place.

The appeal against intoxicants has too often been based upon sentiment merely, and again and again it has been found that this was not a sufficient lever to induce a tempted man to give up his baneful habit and step over the line into safety. When it comes to a question of deliberation between losing a profitable job or holding on to it, a man may not refuse to take and keep a pledge, particularly when reinforced by the good company of great numbers of his fellow employees.

As a safeguard against preventable accidents temperance stands well in the front. Mistakes are made through carelessness by veterans who have many times run a risk without misadventure, as was lately pointed out in an interesting article in one of the magazines. The writer was a signal man of long experience, and the sum of his conclusions was that a large percentage of accidents was due to disobedience of orders and heedlessness, usage having made engineers and conductors somewhat reckless.

Granting this to be true there still remains the undisputed fact that a weary switchman who has taken a stimulant to keep out the cold may forget his duty at the proper moment, that a telegraph operator may send the wrong message from a similar cause, and that sleeping passengers may be hurled into eternity through an error committed by somebody whose mind was not quite clear or whose judgment was temporarily clouded.

If the crusade for temperance started among railroad men could be indefinitely extended, a multitude of men, women and children would have reason to thank God.

A Canadian's Appreciation

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Your new small edition of the Red Letter Bible is perfect. It is a gem and unquestionably the finest specimen of press work, binding, and general arrangement I have ever seen in a small edition of the Bible. It reflects the greatest credit on the man who conceived it, and on those who carried out his ideas to such complete perfection.

This book has only to be seen to sell, and I predict for it a success equal to your fondest expectations.

fresh air as this schedule allows for, seems a pity as well as a mistake. In winter, after four o'clock, daylight is soon gone. Evening hours ought to be spent in the house. Three or four hours a day at most ought to be enough for brain development in the line of school education, and if that amount of time were thoroughly utilized, it is probable that the schools would turn out a great many satisfactory students. In our present educational scheme this shorter time would be insufficient to meet the demands of school boards and superintendents. Not satisfied with giving children tuition in reading, writing, spelling and arithmetic, those foundation stones of culture, we to-day insist that they shall have instruction in zoology, botany, geology, musical notation, ancient and modern history, physiology and other subjects in which they can be taught very little to advantage, and not enough to give them so much as a careful grounding, while teachers are prematurely worn out in the endeavor to do all that is required of them.

ESPERANTO CIRCLES IN ALL LANDS

The Foremost Ambassador of the New Language Speaks to CHRISTIAN HERALD Readers

IN my native city of Geneva, Switzerland, in the spring of 1903, as a schoolboy of thirteen, I found one evening a grammar of Esperanto. I was so interested in it that I didn't go to bed before having learned the rules of so easy and so simple a language. That night, with one of my friends, I began to work, and labored every day to acquire the vocabulary of the language, and to get practice in writing and speaking it.

The Founder of Esperanto

After a few weeks we founded an Esperanto club with some school comrades, and an Esperanto magazine, the Young Esperantist. We were ridiculed somewhat in the beginning, as well by our teachers as by the majority of the other boys. Outside of the school we encountered everywhere the mockery of the people in a city where the international language was considered as Utopian nonsense.

Soon a new world was opened to us by corresponding in Esperanto with people all over the earth. We entered into this beautiful Esperantoland, which has the whole world as its territory and the brotherhood of man as its standard. New ideas, new feelings dawned upon us. We began to feel something greater, something higher than the poor, small ideals of schoolboys, who know nothing outside of their own city and its football grounds.

*En la mondon venis nova sento;
Tra la mondo iras forta voko.

We became enthusiastic over the efforts of Dr. Zamenhof to bring the nations together in a better understanding. We felt that it was the duty of young people to take it up and to spread it.

I next started Esperanto classes in Geneva, and tried by my little magazine to organize an international correspondence between young people of all countries. The attempt was very successful. Think for a moment how fascinating it is for young boys or girls in Japan, in Russia, in Italy, to make friends everywhere in other lands, and to exchange postal cards, stamps, views, information, etc., about their respective countries! What a good lesson in geography and what good means to gain practice in Esperanto!

In 1904, I published in French my first pamphlet about the international language. In 1905, I went to the First Universal Congress of Esperantists in Boulogne, France. There were present about 1,000 delegates from more than thirty different countries. Seeing all those people, who never knew each other before, living as real brothers for one week, talking, discussing, singing, and even playing comedies in this new, harmonious, sweet language, was so impressive a spectacle, that I wished very much to bring to the incredulous people of my own city such a living proof of the value and charm of Esperanto.

I invited the Second Congress to Geneva for 1906, and although the organization of such a big conference was a little bit startling for a boy, the Congress was very successful. I conducted as many classes as I could during the preceding winter, and picked out the best pupils as members of the Organization Committee. Twelve hundred people came to this great meeting, and it had a greater effect in converting the people of my country to the new language than any formal discourse.

In Cambridge, England, where we met last summer, we were 1,500 strong. In the Fourth Congress, which will meet next summer in Dresden, Germany, we expect to number 2,000.

The Esperanto movement is now very strong in Europe, and also in Japan. About 750 societies already exist for the spread of the new language. Different kinds of scientific, commercial, literary and sociological magazines are published in the international language. Esperanto is taught in a great number of public schools in France, and also in England, Switzerland and Russia. In some towns, the Esperanto pupils are so numerous that the school boards now give preference to those candidates for school teachers who know the new language. A great many young people are now able to make new friends abroad, to travel and to find situations through the knowledge and influence of Esperanto.

In 1905, the Committee for the Teaching of Esperanto to Young People was founded and chose me as its International President. I have been lecturing through some of the European countries, but until last June I was still a student and could use for my Esperanto propaganda only my evenings and vacations. Last summer, after my last examinations, I went to England for the Esperanto Congress, where some American friends asked me to come to this country to advance the Esperanto movement. As I did not know a word of English, I remained four months in England, long enough to acquire the language, though imperfectly, and to earn, by teaching in London and Cambridge, the money necessary to come over here. Two months ago, I went back to Switzerland, stopping on the way at Paris. I delivered some lectures and then came to America. I have visited here seven cities and delivered about thirty lectures. In New York City, I spoke before the Board of School Superintendents and in many public schools. I conducted Esperanto classes in the Normal College and in Washington Irving High School. In Boston I spoke in the Public Library, in the Twentieth Century Club, in a Latin school, in the Blind Institute, and other places, and found everywhere an encouraging interest in Esperanto. In Cambridge, Mass., I spoke to the students at Harvard Union, where I was introduced by the world-famous Professor William James, whose conversion to our work is the greatest encouragement I have had in America. I hope soon to see President Roosevelt, and trust he may help our work too by his influence. I expect to see, at no distant date, a general demand for the introduction of Esperanto into the public schools of America.

Edmond Privat

I have a few months more to spend in this country before going back to Europe, and I should like, meanwhile, to help all who are interested in Esperanto to form classes, clubs, etc., in each city. The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ought to form everywhere circles of about six members each to learn the language in a conversational way. Choosing as chairman a person who has already some slight acquaintance with a foreign language, they could learn Esperanto together quickly without needing a special teacher. International correspondence is also an excellent way to learn the language, and it might possibly be arranged by the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to find foreign correspondents for those readers who become proficient and who ask him for it in a note in good Esperanto.

If in any way I can help those who are interested in the new language by delivering a lecture in their city, or by advising them in organizing for study, I should be glad to do so, if they will take charge of travel or postal expenses.

I believe that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has given to its readers an excellent opportunity to advance a splendid cause, and at the same time to gain the first advantages of this work. Esperanto may soon be introduced in the American schools, as it is now taught in Europe. Where shall the teachers be found if not among the first Esperantists of the country? There is not yet a great number of Americans who speak Esperanto. Parents who have children in the high schools or training colleges ought now to make them learn it thoroughly, that they may be ready to grasp the opportunities that are sure to arise. When Esperanto has become an "official" language, everybody will learn it; but the merit and the positions of teachers will belong to those who have had foresight enough to learn it before it became official. And who will regret having worked in a cause that means so much for peace and public utility? When one thinks of the actual results of Esperanto already achieved and looks forward to future results also, one becomes more and more enthusiastic for it. It is the duty of the young people of America to stand up for such a grand educational work, and by their ardor to aid and encourage other nations. The great Russian writer, Tolstoi, said that the work of the Esperantists is one of the most efficient for advancing throughout the world the kingdom of Him whose birth was announced in the words, "Peace on earth, good will to men."

And this is why, for twenty-one years past, the endeavors of the Esperantists have been so visibly blessed. With slow but sure progress the new language has planted strong roots everywhere. "The sacrifices," said Tolstoi, "which any one makes in learning this international language are so slight, and the results so immense, that no one should refuse to attempt it."

I am sure that among THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers there are many who will attempt it, and inspire others to do the same. It was to tell you this that I came to this country. To any one who wishes to collaborate in this ideal I offer my hand.

Among the Workers

—REV. MR. BEAUCHAMP is holding revival meetings at Birkville, Kansas.

—A UNION REVIVAL, conducted by Evangelist Robert L. Layfield, closed lately at Atkinson, Ill.; 134 professed faith in Christ.

—REV. MR. COCHRANE, of Antrim, N. H., lately preached the closing sermon of his forty years' pastorate with the Antrim Presbyterian Church. The pastors of the Baptist and Methodist churches, with their people and many from other towns, came to hear him.

—AT THE RECENT meeting of the Third Mid-Winter Evangelistic and Soul-Winning Conference, held in Chicago, rural evangelism was a prominent topic. The Moody Bible Institute was asked to take the initiative in organizing an interdenominational society to carry on such a work.

—A SERIES of evangelistic services has just ended at Lysander, N. Y. The first two weeks were preparatory meetings under the pastors. On December 5 Evangelists Sheldon and Mitchell arrived and remained until December 22. More than one hundred professed to have found Christ. The churches were quickened into new life.

—HASBROUCK HEIGHTS, N. J., has been the scene of a series of notable revival meetings. Three denominations united their forces and Pastors McGeorge, Staats and Evans labored zealously and successfully at all the meetings. Countess Von Boos-Farrar's singing was a feature of the revival. Many conversions are reported.

Welcomed in the Home

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I have received the Red Letter Bible, India-paper edition, and am very much pleased with it, also with the Calendar and the copy of the "Declaration of Independence." Thank you for them all. We shall enjoy having THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in our home.

Greeks Seeking the New World

By REV. A. D. ZARAPHONITHES

THOUSANDS of young Greeks, descendants of Achilles and Agamemnon, are leaving the shores of Peloponnesus, and coming to the New World. They are of the average age of twenty-five years, and possess intelligence and robust constitutions. They are of the stuff that makes good citizens.

Other nationalities have their representatives at the Ellis Island immigration depot to meet their own people, direct them and attend to their needs, temporal and spiritual; but the Greeks are left alone. They are neglected and left to wander about in unknown regions, like their great legendary ancestor, Ulysses. Many of these young men have been brought up in a moral home atmosphere. In the rural districts of Greece, they have it very hard to secure work. We provided for their temporary support, until we succeeded in getting them employment. The other workmen protested because of their poor clothing, and the Bureau fitted them with decent suits and undergarments. This is a fair illustration of many others of a similar character.

Not only men but women immigrants from Greece come to the Bureau for advice and help. Many find it a safe refuge until they can communicate with friends. Frequently, women immigrants apply at the Bureau for work. A woman from Athens, Greece, with two children, applied, and the mother and daughter were placed in a home, where they are now earning their living, while the son was sent to work in Massachusetts.

The founders of this work among Greek immigrants feel the urgent need of a well equipped home for women as well as men. It is proposed to establish a home where the newcomers can secure cheap but comfortable lodging and food at nominal cost. In the same buildings there would be a reading room and an Employment Bureau, the whole to be under the care of a capable Christian man and a Christian woman.

The Free Employment Bureau is at present having a hard struggle to cover current expenses, and must depend upon contributions largely for its support. Any readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who are interested in the work or who desire to know more concerning it, will receive all necessary information by writing to the undersigned at the Free Employment Bureau office, Second Avenue Baptist Church, No. 164 Second Avenue, New York City. A Sunday School for the Greeks is held on Sunday afternoons in this church. An excellent spiritual work is being done among the young immigrants.

The Sight-Singing Classes

WE frequently receive communications from readers saying that they could not join the Sight-Singing Classes earlier and asking whether it is too late to enter now. There is no time limit to entrance in Mme. Newman's classes. Admission may be had now or later, as new classes are constantly forming.

Mme. Newman's course gives the student a general practical working knowledge of the principles of music and Sight-Reading. She holds that singing is as much a matter of the ear as of the voice; that if you hear correctly, you will sing correctly. In her "ear-training" exercises, which begin the course, the main essentials are simply presented and lead logically to the theory of music notation, rhythm, scale-structure, etc., and the pupil sees, one by one, difficulties disappear.

Vocal instruction is also of great physical value if the breathing exercises receive due attention. Mme. Blauvelt says: "I know many a person to have been saved from consumption by a course of singing lessons, which tends to establish a correct use of the voice as well as stimulate the natural love for music. In every one there is a germ of power to appreciate the finest music, and the easiest way to express that appreciation is with the voice."

All who desire to join should send name and address on a postal card to Musical Editor, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

Missionary Zaraphonithes and his Family lived all unknowing of the evils that are associated with large cities. Frequently, on arriving here, they are led away by unscrupulous men who make immigrants their prey. They frequently become the victims of those who pretend to find work for them, and who keep up the delusion until all their money is spent.

Many young Greeks are now employed as waiters and helpers in the hotels and restaurants of New York City. They do not apply for work to the various English and Greek employment bureaus, where they might find employment, but are easily victimized and induced to pay unscrupulous men to secure work for them, and after working for a short while, without receiving any explanation they are discharged, and others put in their places.

After my arrival in America, for more than a year I spent much time visiting factories, hotels, restaurants and other places to find work for young Greeks. Owing to the increasing numbers of those who came to me for help, I was compelled to settle in an East Side, down-town district, where I opened a free employment bureau for the Greeks, and where we are now doing all we can to help them.

Many of these new arrivals in New York and other cities are now engaged in selling fruit and roasting and selling chestnuts and peanuts. Their life is a most laborious one. Many get sick, and we have been instrumental in getting them into a hospital, where they have been treated as the cases required. Our Free Employment Bureau for Greek Immigrants attends to the needs of these people, as most of them do not understand the English language.

On one occasion, there came to our office two young Greeks, who spoke no English, had no work, and neither friends nor money. On account of their ignorance of the language, they found

By MARY McCREA CULTER

THERE was a circle of malcontents in Hawthorne, as there is in every church—a circle composed of people who allow their own jealousies, and private grudges, and desires for personal power, to override all considerations of the welfare of the church. Over this circle in Hawthorne church, Hollis, through her influence over her parents, and by her shrewd and subtle whisperings, had acquired a leadership which she never hesitated to use to further her own plans and purposes. Here lay the secret power that had destroyed the influence of so many ministers, and driven them in discouragement from the field. So long as Mr. Allan had allowed himself to be an innocent tool in the hands of this circle, the remaining majority of the church had received him coldly, and had looked upon him with suspicion. It had been a shrewd scheme on the part of the Haywards to persuade the new minister to board at their house, thus securing an influence over him from the beginning, keeping him from too intimate association with the other party in the church, and moulding his opinions in accord with their own. It had been, for them, a most unfortunate combination of events which sent them all away from home so suddenly that they had not time to provide safe quarters for Mr. Allan, and so had allowed him to "fall into the hands of the enemy," as Hollis expressed it. They had not realized how much might be accomplished in four short weeks, when there was no adverse element to retard or change things. Dora Murray's report, then, came as a disagreeable surprise, and Hollis was fairly puzzled as to what course to pursue. She did not linger long at Dora's home, but went back to her own, and throwing herself down in her favorite hammock, gave herself up to deep thought.

Some time later, Glenn Fraser drove up to the gate, with Mr. Allan as his companion. The minister lingered for a few final remarks, and then, as Glenn drove away, came briskly up the walk, humming a snatch of one of the new songs which the young people had been learning. Seeing Hollis in the hammock, he drew one of the porch chairs near to her, and sat down for one of their old-time, pleasant chats.

"You look warm," Hollis said by way of greeting. "You will find this cool porch much pleasanter than the dusty roads. Have you had a long ride?"

"We went some ten or twelve miles, altogether; but Glenn's horse is a swift traveler, so we made our round in quick time. He was going over to Millville today, and, as I wanted to visit some of our people over that way, he took me along," the young man explained.

"Some of our church people? Who in the world lives over that way?"

"I went to see the Barkers and the Glendennings. They have been at church the last two Sundays, and say they intend to come back to us regularly. They have not attended here for two years past, although their names are still on the church roll. I am glad they are coming back to us, for they appear to be nice people, and will be of much help to us. Their young people are of great assistance with the music."

"You think they are nice now," Hollis answered—"they always are excessively sweet to new friends—but you will soon get enough of them. They are a meddling, quarrelsome lot, and Hawthorne church is better off without them."

"Why, the Lawrences and Miss Walker and the Alisons seem to think a great deal of them, and are delighted with their return," said the worried minister.

"Of course they are pleased. The Barkers and Glendennings always were hand in glove with them, and the Alison-Lawrence contingent need all the backing they can get. You'll soon have trouble on your hands. We tried them in the choir times without number, but it always ended in a quarrel. Sadie Glendinning considers herself an authority on music, and will not follow any leader."

"She works beautifully with Miss Kathleen," objected the minister.

"That is simply so that she can get a hold, so as to run things as soon as Kathleen goes away. Let's see. This is August. Kathleen will be leaving for her school in about two weeks."

"She is not going away this year. She has been elected principal of the Hawthorne school."

"What?" almost screamed Hollis in wrathful surprise, as she sat up in her hammock and eyed the startled preacher. "Not going away? Mercy on us!"

"Why, I thought—" began Mr. Allan, but the girl interrupted:

"Yes, I know what you thought. Kathleen Lawrence has hoodwinked you so completely that you thought the best fortune that could happen to Hawthorne would be to have her stay here; but I know, and a great many others know as well, that there will be the worst kind of trouble in that choir if you keep her at the head of it all winter. Sadie Glendinning would be far preferable, quarrelsome as she is."

"Why would you not help me when I wanted you to do so," asked Mr. Allan, "and thus have prevented all this trouble?"

"Simply because I cannot and will not work under Kathleen Lawrence's dictatorial management. I thought she would leave soon, and then I could come to your assistance without any disgraceful scene. You see, I know these people by heart. We have worried along with them as best we could, ever since the church was organized, and have tried to shield our pastors from their unpleasant influence, and to keep things running smoothly in the church. I get so weary of it all sometimes, that I feel tempted to abjure the whole thing, and just be comfortably wicked."

She looked up at the minister with an arch smile, calculated to draw from him warm protests against such inclinations, and to beguile him into "loving the sinner while condemning the sin," but her ruse failed. Mr. Allan was so troubled over the spirit she displayed, so deeply thoughtful at meeting such adverse conditions, that he failed either to see her coquettish smile, or to note the almost open threat of withdrawal. She looked at him with keen expectation, which faded into dull disappointment as she beheld his abstracted manner and utter forgetfulness of herself.

"Of all the stupid preachers that ever struck Hawthorne, he is the stupidest—sometimes," she thought. "I wish I had not said so much all at once. Now he will go poking off to his study to think it all out and form his own conclusions, unless I forestall him." Aloud, she said: "Are you too weary to walk down to the bridge with me? There has been a sudden rise in the river to-day, as the result of a waterspout out west, and papa says it is worth going to see."

"I wish I could go with you," Mr. Allan replied, coming out of his reverie, "but this is Thursday evening and I must finish my study for prayer-meeting. I should have been at it before this time."

He rose as he spoke, and went away to his room, while Hollis shook up her pillow with unnecessary energy, and resumed the unhappy train of thought which had been interrupted by his arrival.

CHAPTER XV

MINE AND COUNTERMINE

IN the solitude of his room, with his books opened before him, Mr. Allan forgot the prayer-meeting topic which he had come to prepare. His mind and heart were engrossed with what seemed to him a more vital subject of thought—the peace and prosperity of his church. He was harassed by the unpleasant revelations that had come to him. His hopes, which had risen so high, had been shattered by one ruthless blow, and discouragement filled his soul. What had become of the far-reaching plans and purposes of the last few weeks? Why had he suddenly lost faith and courage to carry out the schemes which had been begun so hopefully and prayerfully? Had this been the sickening experience of his ministerial predecessors? No wonder they had shaken off the dust of their feet against the Hawthorne church.

Thus he sat and pondered, not for one moment questioning the veracity of the revelations that had come to him. He had allowed himself to fall so entirely under the influence of the Hayward family, and had become so fascinated by Hollis' beauty and sprightly companionship, that he believed implicitly in her and in her parents, whom he had hitherto looked upon as his most trustworthy advisers.

The supper-bell aroused him from his unhappy reverie, and with a sigh he pushed back his unused volumes and obeyed the summons. He found a dainty supper, served in most appetizing style in the cosy dining-room, and Hollis, in becoming gown and most engaging manner, waiting to serve him.

"Papa and mamma drove out to Cousin Henry's this afternoon, and have not yet returned," she explained. "I found that we could not wait for them, if we are to be on time at the prayer-meeting; so we will take our tea now, and they can have theirs when they are ready for it."

She entertained him in her brightest and happiest manner, while she waited upon him, and made the meal so pleasant that he found himself wondering whether it would not be delightful to have many such meals, with only this pretty girl sitting across the table from him, in a home of their own.

They lingered over the meal until the first bell for prayer-meeting rang.

"There!" Hollis cried, starting to her feet, "we are barely through in time. I shall have to leave these dishes until we come back."

She hastened to close the house and to provide herself with a wrap; then she joined the fascinated young man who was waiting for her on the porch. They walked down the path together, the young man forgetful of his ministerial trials, the girl triumphant in the success of her maneuvers; but at the gate the situation was materially changed.

Glenn Fraser, coming whistling up the street, was just in time to swing the gate open before them.

"How lucky!" he cried. "I was beginning to fear the hobgoblins that come out when twilight falls, but now I am safe. Hobgoblins dassent come around where Hollis is. May I see myself to prayer-meeting with you?"

"It is evident that you intend to do so, whether we wish it or not," Hollis replied spitefully. Why must Glenn, of all people, come along just then to spoil the tête-à-tête that was both so promising and so important?

"What a good guesser you are! You should become a professional mind-reader and necromancer. You'd make a fortune at it. Did you look over those pieces we were talking about?" he asked.

Music Lessons Free

IN YOUR OWN HOME.

A wonderful offer to every lover of music, whether a beginner or an advanced player.

Ninety-six lessons (or a less number if you desire) for either Piano, Organ, Violin, Guitar, Banjo, Cornet, Sight Singing or Mandolin will be given free to make our home study courses for these instruments known in your locality. You will get one lesson weekly, and your only expense during the time you take the lessons will be the cost of postage and the music you use, which is small. Write at once. It will mean much to you to get our free booklet. It will place you under no obligation whatever to us if you never write again. You and your friends should know of this work. Hundreds of our pupils write: "Wish I had known of your school before." "Have learned more in one term in my home with your weekly lessons than in three terms with private teachers, and at a great deal less expense." "Everything is so thorough and complete." "The lessons are marvels of simplicity, and my 11-year-old boy has not had the least trouble to learn." One minister writes: "As each succeeding lesson comes I am more and more fully persuaded I made no mistake in becoming your pupil."

We have been established nine years—have thousands of pupils from eight years of age to seventy. Don't say you cannot learn music till you send for our free booklet and tuition offer. It will be sent by return mail free. Address U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC, Box 7—225 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

suddenly turning his attention to the minister.

"No, I simply forgot them. Miss Hollis was giving me some bits of church history that made me forget present duties," Mr. Allan replied.

"She is well qualified to speak on that theme. We've had some good battles in ancient times, haven't we, Hollis? This church couldn't get along without Hollis and me. We keep life in it by our wranglings, and the choir platform is our usual battle-ground. Did it never occur to you that the red carpet is most appropriate there, and that the majority of choir platforms are carpeted with that color? It is the danger signal—so to speak—emblematical of the bloody battles waged upon it. The choir is like a teeter-board, for Hollis and me. When she is up, I'm down; and when she is out, I'm in. It's perpetual fun to see who'll come out ahead. Sadie Glendenning is back again. Aren't you rejoiced to hear it? Sadie and Hollis are sworn cronies," he concluded audaciously, turning to Mr. Allan.

"We are no such thing," snapped Hollis, completely thrown off her guard. "You know very well that I can't endure her. If you are going to talk such nonsense, we can dispense with your company."

"But I can't dispense with yours, for 'the goblins' I'll git me, ef I don't watch out.' They roost all round our church, you know. What bits of church history were you discussing with Mr. Allan? It is quite important for me to know, for I must be prepared to make my defense when he court-martials me."

"I do not consider it necessary to repeat my private conversation for your benefit. The sooner you are court-martialed, the better for everybody. Let's talk of something agreeable."

"Yes," interposed the annoyed minister. "I fear none of us will be in a very fit frame of mind for prayer-meeting, if we stir up such feelings by the way."

"I beg your pardon," Glenn said promptly. "I entirely forgot that you are not used to such things. As for Hollis and me, we're not in good health if we're in a good humor; so the more we fuss the better we feel. Isn't that so, Hollis?" But the girl made no reply. She walked along with head held high, with flashing eyes and flushed cheeks.

Glenn paid no further attention to her, but dropping his bantering tone, began talking with Mr. Allan about their trip of the morning and their plans for the song rehearsal after prayer-meeting. By the time the church had been reached, the minister's thoughts had been diverted to a more pleasant channel.

The conversation that was so soothing to him produced quite the opposite effect upon Hollis—as Glenn designed it should—so that when the three entered the church her ill-humor was apparent to those who were already there.

Miss Tilly Walker motioned to Glenn, and he slipped obediently into the seat beside her. She looked at him reprovingly.

"Glenn, you have been bad again. You have been tormenting Hollis."

"Yes, ma'am," answered Glenn meekly, with mirth-filled eyes.

"And on the road to prayer-meeting, too," continued Miss Walker.

"Yes, ma'am."

"Will you never learn that such things are neither kind nor wise?"

"No, ma'am," with exaggerated meekness.

"It is not right. You do the girl much harm by arousing her temper, and you cause her to do and say things that are not at all to her credit."

"Yes, ma'am. That's why I did it."

"Glenn! How could you?"

"Well, it's all your fault. If there is any blame, you'll have to answer for it. You won't let me tell Mr. Allan how abominably hateful, and bad-tempered, and deceitful she is, so I have to make her tell him herself. Why, she had him just about ready to propose to her tonight. I saw it in his eyes when I chanced to meet them at the gate, and her manner was already triumphant. Do you think I was going to stand peaceably by, and let him wreck his life and our church too? No, ma'am. I'm too faithful a friend and too good a Christian for that. I bickered with Hollis all the way to church, until she was mad enough to bite a ten-penny nail in two. Yes, ma'am, I've been good. You oughtn't to scold me." His look of wounded virtue made Miss Tilly laugh in spite of herself.

"I fear you were 'doing evil, that good might come,'" she said.

Ministry to the Poor

WHEN we see churches moving from the city to the suburbs, or the residential neighborhood, as the reports say, we realize that in these days it is to the rich and the well-to-do that "the Gospel is preached." The characteristics of Christ's work, to which he drew John the Baptist's attention as signs of its divine origin (Luke 7: 22), have but little resemblance to the Christianity of our time. The Gospel is preached to the poor in missions and there are societies for visiting the prisons; but the preaching to those classes is no longer the main business of the church. The fact is matter for regret on both sides. The poor on their side need the Gospel, and the sleek, well-dressed Christian on his side would be a better man if he came into close contact with the poor. Both lose by the separation.

It is easy to understand why the churches move out of the slums to the residential sections. They are almost deserted. The church in the slums, that was once crowded, is now almost empty. Its former congregation has moved away, and it seems to have no hold on the people who live near it now. The church naturally asks, "Why should the building be kept open? No one comes to it and the preacher would have to preach to empty pews." It is a long journey from the rich man's house to the church he formerly attended; the weather is uncertain, and he has a church nearer home where there is a ministry he enjoys. So the church building is closed or sold to be turned into an office building or a store.

Is there no better solution for the problem? Has the church now no message for the poor? It had in Christ's day and in apostolic days. Have the poor changed? Or has the church forgotten the message? Perhaps the answer lies in the word "ministry." How much ministry has been done of late among the poor? Have they been treated with indifference? It is true that larger sums than ever have been given in charity, but it is not charity that the poor chiefly need. They need that kindness that enters into their difficulties, that listens to their troubles, and that honestly strives to help them. The dote that charity flings to them is welcome and is generally accepted, but it brings the donor and the recipient no nearer together than they were before. It brings no sense of brotherhood. If the rich man's brother were in trouble he would study his case and would strive to help him. But the poor is not his brother, and he is put off with a gift. It is when the church ministers to the poor, that it will win his heart and bring him into the fold.

The Late Morris K. Jesup

MORRIS KETCHUM JESUP, long known as one of America's foremost philanthropists and a prominent banker and financier, died of heart disease at his home in New York City, on Thursday, Jan. 23. He was born in Westport, Conn., in 1830, and was a descendant of an old New England family. While still a young man, he became interested in finance, and organized the firm of Clark & Jesup, bankers, which was later known as M. K. Jesup & Co., and subsequently became Cuyler, Morgan & Co., with Mr. Jesup as a special partner. He was identified with the financing of the Canadian Pacific Railroad and many other important enterprises.

He retired from active business in 1884, and until his death devoted himself to philanthropy. He gave largely of his own fortune to further science and social betterment, and devoted his energies to these projects. He was a member of many clubs and societies, a trustee of nine institutions, a director of three and president of eight societies and institutions devoted to benevolent and humanitarian objects.

He equipped several expeditions of scientists at his own expense, and some of the most valuable features of the New York Museum of Natural History are memorials to his generosity. Yale University and Williams College conferred upon him the degree of Master of Arts, on account of his scholarly attainments, and Princeton gave him the degree of LL.D. He was interested in explorations of all kinds, and was president of the Peary Arctic Club. His contributions to ethnological research were recognized by the Czar of Russia, who two years ago conferred upon him the Grand Cross of the Order of St. Stanislaus.

Mr. Jesup was president of the New York Chamber of Commerce. He was also for many years president of the American Sunday School Union and took an active part in the affairs of the Five Points Mission and the Sailors' Snug Harbor. In 1854 he married Miss Maria Van Antwerp De Witt, daughter of the Rev. Thomas De Witt, who survives him. There are no children. His charities were broadcast.

takes place, the wife usually gives the husband a few rupees. Their marriage is quaint and picturesque, including banquets, dancing, singing of bridal songs, and a forfeit contest in verses. There is no civil or religious marriage ceremony among the lower orders. Divorce consists of snapping a thread, held up on the fingers of the husband and wife.

Hunting, archery, horseback riding, skating and a few other forms of amusement are the chief pastimes. New Year and harvest are the two great festivals. Tibetan greetings are grotesque. When you meet a native in the morning, he says jooly (a universal word of greeting), sticks out his tongue and inclines his head to one side. When a Tibetan man or woman is drinking tea with you, the custom is to shoot out the tongue frequently. In some districts, they greet one another by taking hold of the left ear. Women cross the hands, with closed fists, then bring the right hand to the forehead thrice, saying jooly three times and courtesying. This is considered high etiquette. A social inferior presents you with a scarf, by casting it at your feet; a superior throws it around your neck. When a grandson or granddaughter is born, the grandfather immediately turns over his affairs to his son or heir and retires to private life. In a polyandrous community, such an event frequently retires several supposititious grandfathers at once. The people have a language of flowers, which they embroider in cap or on breast. Nearly all the sentiments can be expressed in this language. The sending of a bunch of yellow flowers is a declaration of love; a broken leaf means a broken heart; three kinds of flowers mixed together is renunciation; red flowers are denunciation; blue are affection, etc.

It is made clear by Ahmad Shah that the voluntary seclusion of Tibet from the world is the result of a fear on the part of the Lamas that when the foreigners come in their own power will pass away forever. Civilization and the Gospel have made but a very slight impression thus far, and their influence is wholly confined to the border people. Tibet has still to be won from its ancient idols and its gross superstitions.

From Defeat to Victory *

GLOOM and sadness have been, in many a crisis of the Church's history, the precursors of joy and triumph. First the cross, then the crown. Time and again the enemy has uttered his shout of victory in the very moment when the sun of deliverance has been coming to the dawn. Fierce persecution has scattered the Christian congregations, killing this man, torturing that man, and driving the other as a fugitive to the mountains. Then, as it will be in the final tribulation, the anti-Christian powers rejoiced and sent congratulations to one another over the destruction of God's servants, only to find that the faith that appeared to be dead had arisen with new power and fuller life. The blood of the martyrs has proved the seed of the Church.

This principle Christ recognized in his own career. His disciples looked forward for him to a long course of triumph and the glory of kingship in Jerusalem, but he had no such delusion. The decease that he must accomplish, the baptism that he must be baptized with, the lifting up that would attract men—these were the grim realities that were before his vision, not the throne and the purple of the capitol. He did not go blindly to his death. He saw in it the way to victory. "For this cause came I into the world." He saw the philosophy of it, too. How pathetic was his explanation to Philip: "Except a grain of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die it bringeth forth much fruit." Had he lived and reigned after a sanguinary battle, grasping the sceptre from the hand of his dead enemies, how small would his position have been! The world would have looked upon him as on Alexander, Caesar, Napoleon, and have admired his genius, but would not have loved and worshiped him. To win the devotion of men he must suffer and die, and out of defeat win the greatest victory.

The principle applied to the head of the Church and to the history of the Church is true of the individual. Men do not enter that kingdom with the pride and ardor of victors. It is when they acknowledge defeat; when they confess that in themselves they are nothing; when they learn that no effort of their own can avail them, and they give up the struggle and yield themselves to Christ to be saved, that they find rest and peace. Every victor in the Church's array of heroes has become such by defeat. There he learned not to rely on himself, but on divine strength. He cries in reverence with his Master: "I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold, I am alive for evermore."

PANTRY CLEANED

A Way Some People Have

A doctor said:—

"Before marriage my wife observed in summer and country homes, coming in touch with families of varied means, culture, tastes and discriminating tendencies, that the families using Postum seemed to average better than those using coffee."

"When we were married two years ago, Postum was among our first order of groceries. We also put in some coffee and tea for guests, but after both had stood around the pantry about a year untouched, they were thrown away, and Postum used only."

"Up to the age of 28 I had been accustomed to drink coffee as a routine habit and suffered constantly from indigestion and all its relative disorders. Since using Postum all the old complaints have completely left me, and I sometimes wonder if I ever had them."

Teaching Tenement Housewives

FOR several years past a philanthropic society of wealthy ladies, known as "The League for Home Economics," have conducted cooking classes in the homes of the women of the New York City tenements. The wives and mothers attending these classes have manifested so keen an appreciation, that the League has been encouraged to open a School for Housekeeping.

A three-room flat in the heart of one of the congested sections of the city has been rented and furnished with a view to making it a "Home Centre," where wives, mothers and young women of the neighborhood may learn everything pertaining to the management of their homes, and where instruction will be given in the laws of hygiene, expenditure of income, judicious marketing, selection of pure food, plain cooking, nursery, laundry work, sewing and baby tending. The front or living room, with painted floors and walls, has been furnished with plain wooden furniture, cheese-cloth draperies at the windows, and a table which may serve as dining table. Efforts will be made to teach the women the delight of sitting down as families, at neatly training, rather than enter the factories.

Work of a similar nature is being carried on by Miss Nellie Huntington, daughter of the late Col. J. T. Huntington, former partner of John D. Rockefeller, who is conducting classes in the Goodrich House Settlement of Cleveland, O., for the training of young girls in the ways of economy and practical decent living. Miss Huntington is an heiress in her own right, but has turned from the fascinations of society to teach "little mothers" how to live tidily, hygienically, and comfortably at minimum cost, in flats of three or four rooms.

In Chicago there was a stir in fashionable circles recently when it became known that Mr. Joseph Medill McCormick, son of Hon. Robert S. McCormick, former ambassador, and his wife, who was Miss Ruth Hanna, daughter of the late Hon. Mark Hanna, had left their home on the Lake Shore Drive to live, for a while at least, in the University of Chicago Settlement House out among the stockyards. Mr. and Mrs. McCormick are impressed with a desire to help solve the problem of right living for the unskilled laborer who, on a small weekly spread tables, covered with well-cooked, nourishing food, instead of standing about the tubs in the kitchen and taking turns at a poorly cooked meal, eked out by stuff from the popular delicatessen store, and, too often, the can of beer. The tiny kitchen appeals to the eye of every woman who beholds the row of shelves, with their shining kitchen utensils.

"They will see for the first time in their lives a well-equipped kitchen," says Mrs. Julian Heath, the president of the League. "Nothing will be in this flat that they could not have themselves. There are many ideas we should like to introduce that would be beyond these people's purses; therefore we don't have them here. All the rooms will be furnished simply and prettily and suitably, with an eye to making the most of small space."

The League for Home Economics plans to inaugurate a system of home centres, such as the one just opened. The expense of maintaining a centre will be about $1,200 a year. The co-operation of the tenement women has been kept uppermost during the execution of plans for the model flat, many consultations having been held with interested housewives, who volunteered advice. While the school is mainly for the instruction of women, girls, too, are trained for domestic service. Several mothers have said that they would be glad to have their daughters take such a wage, must house and feed and clothe a family. The typical three-room flat, with its dozen human beings crowded into it, is characteristic of this neighborhood. The population of this community is largely Slavic. How to raise their crude standards of living and to help them become good Americans is a problem requiring wisdom, sympathy, and intelligent co-operation.

Walking Around the Globe

Francis Kivikias, a native of Finland, undertook the task of walking around the world, and set out three and a half years ago. The journey was the result of a wager between a grain merchant of San Francisco for whom Kivikias was working, and a German millionaire from the same city, who backed two Germans against the Finn. The three competitors left San Francisco on Feb. 15, 1904, marching toward Alaska. There they suffered terribly from cold; the two Germans had their feet frozen, and were obliged to give up. Kivikias plodded on bravely. He crossed China, says the North China News, and during the war reached Japan, where he was arrested for a spy. He proved his innocence and was released; but in Manchuria the Cossacks caught him, and he only got away by bribing them. In Siberia he was chased by wolves. Should he win, the prize is to be a sum of money and a farm of 170 acres in California.

What the Peace Conference Did

AS there have been many conflicting opinions expressed here and abroad relative to the work actually accomplished at the Hague Peace Conference, a member of the staff of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts) submitted a list of the unanimous conclusions of the Hague Conference to several of the American delegates for their revision and approval. The result is the following concise and accurate statement of twenty-one new additions to international law, which, having been adopted by cable orders of the governments represented, will undoubtedly be ratified by them. The list is now published for the first time and may be regarded as absolutely accurate.

The Hague Conference of 1907, by the unanimous vote of forty-five nations—

1. Established the inviolability of neutral territory and the right of asylum in it of prisoners of war.
2. Prohibited belligerents from establishing wireless telegraph stations in neutral territory.
3. Forbade belligerent ships revictualling at neutral ports, except to complete their normal supplies, or to take fuel, except to reach the nearest port of their own country.
4. Provided that hostilities should not begin except by a declaration of war, or an ultimatum with conditional declaration.
5. Directed that a state of war must be notified without delay to neutral powers, and may be given by wire.
6. Prohibited the dropping of projectiles from balloons.
7. Required indemnification by any belligerent who violates the laws of war.
8. Declared that it is desirable to give a definite period of grace to be allowed merchantmen in an enemy's ports at the outbreak of hostilities.

9. Prohibited the use of mines for restricting commercial navigation.

10. Prohibited the use of floating mines, except those so constructed as to become innocuous within an hour after they pass from human control.

11. Prohibited the use of anchored mines that do not become innocuous after they have broken their moorings.

12. Prohibited the bombardment of unfortified places.

13. Provided for the inviolability of fishing boats and small craft.

14. Provided for the inviolability of the postal service.

15. Ratified the humanitarian recommendations of the Geneva Red Cross Convention of 1906, and added others.

16. Provided for the humane treatment of captured crews.

17. Established an international prize court, in which unlimited right of appeal is given where neutrals are concerned.

18. Prohibited any nation from attempting forcibly to collect a debt claimed by its citizens of the government of another nation, unless there has been a previous offer by the creditor country to submit the question of the indebtedness to arbitration.

19. Declared in favor of a permanent international court (realization delayed because of the difficulty of forming a court of limited number of judges when all States wished to be represented).

20. Proclaimed its belief in the principle of obligatory arbitration.

21. Provided for a reassembling of the Conference.

On many other progressive propositions there was a majority vote, but the above were unanimous, and so will be incorporated in a treaty which, when ratified by all the participating powers, will become a valuable addition to international law.

An Appeal to Jesus

By Mrs. M. BAXTER

WE are about to consider our Lord's first recorded miracle of healing.

After the two days of his ministry in Sychar, following on the steps of the newly converted Samaritan woman, Jesus "went forth from thence into Galilee. For Jesus himself testified that a prophet hath no honor in his own country" (R.V.). What! Was Jesus, then, bent upon avoiding honor? Yes, absolutely. He declared, "I receive not honor from men" (John 5: 41), and he acted on this principle all his life through.

The people of Sychar said, "This is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world;" but the people of Nazareth, where he was brought up, said, "Is not this Joseph's son?" (Luke 4: 22). "Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, the brother of James and Joses, and of Juda, and Simon? and are not his sisters here with us? And they were offended at him" (Mark 6: 3). Yet Jesus did not remain in Samaria, where he was recognized, but went into Galilee, among his own, who "received him not." This was not from any morose, misanthropical spirit, which made him gloomy and moody; but his Father, who guided all his steps, would not give him into the hands of men, or let his Messiahship be made known by these Samaritans, who had but a partial knowledge of him. He left his Father to work out all his will, and according to that will he went into Galilee.

A change had come over the Galileans; they had seen Jesus in a new character. The young carpenter of Nazareth had publicly rebuked those who bought and sold in the temple, and no man had forbidden him. He had spoken with the elders of the Jews in Jerusalem, "and many had believed in his name when they saw the miracles which he did" (John 2: 23). He had gained such an influence over the people during the few days of the feast, that his name was in every mouth, and so it was now to the interest of the Galileans to know and own him whom they had not marked before. "The Galileans received him, having seen all the things that he did at Jerusalem at the feast; for they also went unto the feast."

There was "a nobleman, whose son was sick at Capernaum." This man must have heard of Jesus, either from some who had been up to Jerusalem, or from some who had seen the water turned into wine; so he went in person to Jesus, "and besought him that he would come down and heal his son; for he was at the point of death." It may be that he thought he was conferring a favor on the carpenter of Nazareth in calling him in to exercise his power on such an august personage as the son of an aristocrat. He was very unlike the centurion who said, "Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof" (Matt. 8: 8), for he stipulated that the cure should be performed his way. "Come down and heal my son."

To his great surprise, Jesus answered him, "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe." The great Healer of soul and body saw in the nobleman a disease more deadly and more enduring than that which was fast sapping the life of his son. He saw that his faith needed healing. "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe." It is very natural (but it is not at all Divine) for us to make a picture in our minds as to how a prayer is to be answered, and if the answer does not come in that way, to judge that God is unfaithful, and to complain that he has not answered at all.

In times of financial stress, such as existed from Oct. 22d to the first week in December of last year, the safety of real estate mortgages is most apparent. This is the security you obtain for every dollar placed with the Industrial Savings & Loan Co. See their ad. on page 110.

What Will You Give To Be Well

I CANNOT tell you how happy I am that I have been able to bring health and strength to 30,000 women in the past six years. Just think! this means a whole city. It is to my thorough study of anatomy, physiology and health principles, and to my 12 years personal experience before I began my instructions by mail, that I attribute my marvelous success. It would do your heart good to read the reports from my pupils—and I have done all this by simply studying Nature's laws adapted to the correction of each individual difficulty.

If vital organs or nerve centers are weak, I strengthen them so that each organ does its work. I want to help every woman to be perfectly, gloriously well, with that sweet, personal loveliness which health and a wholesome, graceful body gives—a cultured, self-reliant woman with a definite purpose, full of the health and vivacity which makes you

You can easily remove the fat and it will stay removed. I have reduced 15,000 women.

Too Fleeshy?

One pupil writes me: "Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I feel so well I want to shout! I never get out of breath now."

"When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy. I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

I may need to strengthen your stomach, intestines and nerves first. A pupil who was thin, writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman."

"My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel so well all the time."

Write me today telling me your faults in health or figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you. I never treat a patient I cannot help. If I cannot help you I will refer you to the help you need.

Miss Cocroft's name stands for progress in the scientific care of the health and figure of women.

A Corset is not Needed for a Good Figure

To Have Good Figure.
Vibrant Health,

I bring each pupil to symmetrical proportions and I teach her to stand and to walk in an attitude which bespeaks culture and refinement. A good figure, gracefully carried, means more than a pretty face. Nature's rosy cheeks are more beautiful than paint or powder. I help you to Arise To Your Best!

The day for drugging the system has passed. In the privacy of your own room, I strengthen the muscles and nerves of the vital organs, lungs and heart and start your blood to circulating as it did when you were a child. I teach you to breathe, so that the blood is fully purified.

You Can Be Well Without Drugs

And the vital strength gained by a forceful circulation relieves you of such chronic ailments as Constipation, Torpid Liver, Indigestion, Rheumatism, Weaknesses, Catarrh, Dullness, Irritability, Nervousness, Sleeplessness or Weak Nerves by strengthening whatever organs or nerves are weak.

I wish I could put sufficient emphasis into these words to make you realize that you do not need to be ill, but that you can be a buoyant, vivacious, attractive woman in return for just a few minutes' care each day in your own home.

Individual Instruction—I give each pupil the individual, confidential treatment which her case demands.

For ten cents I send you a card of correct pose for your dressing table and a booklet, showing you how to stand and walk with ease.

Questions and Answers

N. A. J. See, Mich. Is a man justified in breaking the law, even though that law be unjust?

We do not think so. It is an axiom that the best way to abolish a bad law is to enforce it, meaning that its enforcement will lead to its revocation. One ought to obey the laws of the land, and if these laws are oppressive and iniquitous, then the proper remedy is popular agitation, seeking redress through parliamentary channels, but not through law-breaking or revolution.

F. L. Orange, N. J. What is the real meaning of the word "Levant"?

It comes from the French word lever, "to rise," meaning the East. Applied to Asia Minor, Turkey, Greece, etc.

Mrs. F. H. Bemidji, Minn. What is the relative value of voice, pen, and purse, in the evangelization of America?

All three are closely related in the movement for national evangelization, and ought to work together. Christians should be bold to speak, prompt to advocate by their pens, and generous to support with their means, every movement looking to the spiritual betterment of our people. As to the comparative value of the three, it might be said that each, in its own peculiar way, is of the highest importance and each has, at different times, achieved triumphs which would be impossible to the others.

L. C. Jones, Winchester, Ky. What is the meaning of the name of the steamer Mauretania? Has it any historical connections?

Mauretania is the ancient name for Northwest Africa. The designation was used by early Roman historians.

C. H., Dilley, Tex. 1. In an ideal state of society, do you think street cars would be used to convey people to church on Sunday? 2. Is Browning sufficiently plain to be read intelligibly by people who have received only a common school training?

1. While we hold that Sunday travel, save in cases of absolute necessity, or to perform some work of mercy, should be avoided, we confess our inability to conceive of a condition that would involve the total disuse of street cars. Such a thing is very unlikely to happen. 2. There are difficult and obscure passages, of course, but these you will find greatly cleared in editions with explanatory notes or annotations.

J. H., Pilsen, N. H. Why were the Atlas Mountains of Africa so called?

They were named after Atlas, an enormous giant of mythology, who the ancients believed supported the heavens on his shoulders.

L. M. K., Columbia City, Ind. In John 2: 15, were the owners of the sheep, oxen and doves driven out of the Temple, or was it the animals alone?

The text states clearly that he drove the money changers and sellers of animals out "and the sheep and the oxen," and even flung out the money. "Take these things hence" is the unmistakable language. It was a general clearance, bag and baggage.

F. F. H., Peterson, Ia. 1. Are goods that are made in America, such as watches, machinery, etc., sold in foreign countries for less than here? 2. Are they inferior goods or are they the same as are sold here?

1. Plows, sewing machines and certain other articles of American manufacture are sold abroad for less than they bring in the home market. We cannot tell about watches. 2. They are presumably the same as those sold here.

H. L. D., Webster City, Ia. In the MAIL-BAG you condemn promiscuous gatherings such as are found at roller-skating rinks. Are not such gatherings an opportunity for Christian influence to affect the lives of many who do not attend church? If the Christian does not meet the unbeliever how can the latter be evangelized? 2. An acquaintance is much given to the use of profanity in his own home circle. Shall I refuse to enter his home socially, and can I properly ask him to reform his language?

1. We regard the opportunities for spiritual work at roller-skating rinks, under present conditions, as too slight to be considered. On the other hand, such gatherings afford opportunities for acquaintanceships that are frequently undesirable, and lead to many bitter regrets afterwards. 2. You would be justified in speaking to him quietly about the matter, and if, after your protest, it was persisted in, you would be quite right in declaring that unless he discontinued the use of profanity, you could not resume social relations.

A reader of this paper, Dr. Isaac Prince, New York City, sends this striking suggestion:

Recalling the multitudes upon multitudes of people of foreign speech, who have been sent to our Gospel-favored shores, I have wondered if it is not one of those signs of the times, when, in the day of our Lord, he is bringing them to this valley of decision, to lead them to choose or reject him, to receive or refuse the good news of salvation; to break loose from the traditions and superstitions of man, and to be brought into the clear inquiries about looking glasses that came over in the Mayflower. There is one looking glass that came over in the Mayflower in the Western Reserve Historical Building, at Cleveland, O.

R. R. W., Roll, Okla. To whom did Christ refer in speaking (Matt. 11: 14) of Elias?

There was a prophecy that God would send Elijah or Elias to turn the hearts of the people (Malachi 4: 5). When John appeared the Jews asked him if he was Elias, and he answered that he was not (John 1: 21). They evidently expected that the literal Elijah, who is represented as ascending to heaven without dying (II. Kings 2: 11), would be sent to earth. John knew he was not that. He regarded himself as a humble messenger, a mere voice, with no distinction but that of preparing the way. The character of his preaching, however, shows that, like other in God's hands and it is wisely ordained that we cannot lift the veil. In all generations there have been men who pretended to read the future, but they have always failed.

R. G., Carsonville, O. 1. Who was the last prophet of the old dispensation? 2. Did the Satan who now tempts men tempt the patriarch Job?

1. John the Baptist came as the forerunner of Christ, and so may be considered the last prophet of the old dispensation. Christ said: "All the prophets and the law prophesied until John" (Matt. 11: 13). Otherwise, if you regard him as belonging to an intermediate dispensation, the last would be the prophet called Malachi, the writer of the last book in the Old Testament. It is not certain that Malachi was his name, as the word may be translated, "My messenger." 2. There is no other power that we know by that name. The first chapters of the book of Job do not indicate so much a temptation as a test whether Job would be faithful to God in adversity.

Mrs. S. H. S., Wind Gap, Pa. What authority has a minister for saying it is impossible to worship God in some climates? It seems to me to be contrary to Christ's command, "to preach the Gospel to all nations."

No authority whatever. God can be worshiped, and is to-day worshiped, in every land and climate on earth.

M. B., Easton, Pa. Is the story of the spider weaving a web across the entrance to a cave to be found in the Bible? If not, where can it be found?

No. It is a legend first told of Mohammed, who hid in a cave when fleeing from Mecca from the Koreishites, who sought to kill him, but did not enter when they saw a spider web that had appeared overnight.

Subscriber, Belltown, Pa. Is the story of the Deluge fact or allegory? Were all living creatures on earth destroyed?

The references to it in the literature of other nations confirm the Bible account of it as a historical fact. The Flood was probably not universal. It would answer its purpose, if the human race, excepting those in the ark, were destroyed. Animals living in other parts of the earth than those occupied by men, were perhaps left unhurt.

This little Gospel giant could in the market-place, the highways and byways, the seraglios, the caravan and vessels of the sea, and in places and among peoples where the male messenger of the cross is not permitted to enter, become an inspired teacher of the redemption from sin and death through faith in the Crucified One. TO RESTORE "IN GOD WE TRUST"

Three Bills Before Congress to Put Back the Motto in Obedience to Popular Demand

THERE is little doubt but that the present session of Congress will witness the enactment of legislation requiring the motto "In God We Trust" to be replaced on all the important coins of the country. The protest of the American people, voiced through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which has received thousands of letters demanding its restoration, is not to pass unheeded. Three different bills looking to the restoration of the motto have been introduced in the House of Representatives, and a canvass of the most influential members seems to indicate that there is practically no objection to the contemplated action. Furthermore, there is no expectation that President Roosevelt will veto such a measure, should it be passed by the legislators.

As our readers are already aware, the President, for reasons which he has publicly explained, does not wholly approve of the motto being placed on the coins. He stated his position on the subject at some length in a communication which he gave to the public press at the time the storm of protest broke, when it was discovered that the significant words had been omitted from the new designs prepared by St. Gaudens for our gold coins. At the same time, it is not understood that President Roosevelt personally stipulated or even suggested that the motto be left out of the new designs. The disappearance of the time-honored phrase was apparently due either to oversight, or to the fact that the artist did not deem it an essential part of the design.

Now, while President Roosevelt's private opinion is against the wisdom of introducing the words "In God

We Trust" on our coins, he has no desire or intention to insist upon the universal acceptance of this judgment. Representative J. Hampton Moore of Pennsylvania, who has introduced one of the bills providing for the restoration of the motto, talked with the President on the subject a short time since. The Chief Magistrate indicated that he had no objection to any legislation Congress might see fit to enact on the subject. He explained that his contention merely was that there is no

The chairman of this committee is Representative William B. McKinley of Illinois, the close personal friend of Speaker Cannon. The other members of the committee are Congressmen Ira W. Wood of New Jersey, Joseph R. Knowland of California, William C. Lovering of Massachusetts, George A. Pearre of Maryland, Charles A. Kennedy of Iowa, Joel Cook of Pennsylvania, Samuel McMillan of New York, Joseph G. Beale of Pennsylvania, Addison D. James of Kentucky, Peter

In order that the whole subject covered by these various bills might be thoroughly investigated Chairman McKinley has referred the measures to a subcommittee, consisting of Representatives Pearre, Wood, and Carlin. These members have held numerous meetings to canvass the situation, and there is little doubt that their recommendations will be adopted by the full committee and, thus endorsed, offered for the action of Congress. Presumably only one bill will have the sanction of the Committee. It may be any one of the three measures now under consideration, or it may be an entirely new measure that will embody the best features of several or all of these proposed laws.

The first bill on the subject, introduced on December 2, 1907, by Representative Ollie M. James of Kentucky, provides "That all coins of the United States of America

All of the bills introduced in the House of Representatives with the intent of securing the formal adoption of the motto "In God We Trust" for our coinage, have, in the natural order of business, been referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures.

A SERMON BY

Robert Stuart MacArthur*

The Hidden Force

TEXT—Matt. 13: 33

"The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven"

OUR Lord was the world's greatest teacher. Never did men speak more wisely than did his enemies when they said, "Never man spake like this man." The whole world has been sitting for two thousand years at the feet of Jesus Christ, and learning of him. Men are never prepared to walk the dizzy heights of intellectual greatness until they have sat in lowly reverence at the feet of the world's great Teacher. Jesus Christ is, as the Germans say, "Der Einzige," the Unique. He stands alone among the world's great teachers. To-day science and philosophy are coming to sit at his feet. To-day the foremost thinkers along the lines of sociology are only attempting to approach the Sermon on the Mount. There is not to-day, in any country, or in any science or philosophy, a man who can be considered as foremost in his department of thought, who is opposed to the teachings of Jesus Christ.

He did not introduce the teaching of parables. He did, however, in this chapter, introduce the parabolic method of instruction, so far as his own public teaching was concerned. As this chapter gives us the first examples in Christ's teaching of the use of parables, so it gives us the largest number of parables found in any one chapter; we have nowhere else "so many and so costly pearls strung upon a single thread." The entire series is strikingly beautiful. Here we have seven parables; four of them spoken while our Lord sat in the boat on the beautiful Sea of Galilee, the most honored sheet of water on this globe; and three spoken to a smaller circle of the disciples in his own home. I shall set aside all discussion of the mere machinery of the parable, and proceed to the truths taught in the text.

Religion an External Force

Your attention is therefore called, in the first place, to the fact that religion is an external force introduced into our life. The woman, as we are told, took the leaven and hid it in three measures of meal. True religion is not a philosophy; it is a revelation. It is not an evolution; it is primarily an involution. True religion is the gift of God—"Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him." The water of life is the water of God. After we have partaken thereof, it is within us as a well of water springing up into everlasting life. True religion is, in its beginning in individual experience, an external bestowment. Men cannot, by anything that is within them inherently, develop the noblest character, and the greatest likeness to Jesus Christ. No man can lift himself except he lay hold of something outside himself. No man can lift himself by the straps of his boots. The more he lifts upward, the more he necessarily presses downward. In order that a man may lift himself, he must lay hold on some force apart from himself. It thus comes to pass that, when men are conscious of their weakness, and lay hold on Christ, he lifts them above themselves, above their environment, above all earthly things. The woman took the leaven from without, and hid it in three measures of meal.

In the second place, I notice that religion thus received becomes an internal force; the woman hid the leaven within the meal. The world, even to-day, does not fully recognize the presence of this divine force in human society. The great world of classic Greece and Rome seemed strangely unconscious of the new force introduced into the life of the time by Jesus Christ. Nothing more surprises a student of that early day than to read the great writers and observe their utter silence regarding the kingdom of God. How can you account for that silence? Here was a force introduced into Greek and Roman society which was utterly to revolutionize its philosophy, its science, and its religion. Here was a force which was to shed a brighter glory on the Acropolis than ever flashed forth from Parnassus. Here was a force that was to give greater eloquence than was ever heard from any Greek bema. Here was a new science which was to revolutionize every colony of Rome, and finally overturn the throne of the Cæsars; yet the great classical writers were apparently almost ignorant of the fact. Some of them did, indeed, refer to Christ, calling him Chrestus; but they referred to him in a vague, indefinite, and very inadequate manner. It seems impossible to account for their ignorance of this new force that had been introduced into their civil, social, intellectual, and religious life. It was a force that not only changed their government, their science, their philosophy, and their religion; but it changed their language and their literature. Here was a divine power put into the old linguistic skin-bottles, and it burst them. It was a force which gave a new meaning to the words that were employed, when it did not create new words.

Words with New Meaning

The student of language will find no more fruitful field for his inquiries than the study of the changes in meaning that came to Greek and Latin words, as the result of this new leaven that was put into the linguistic meal. Take the word "love," as given us by the New Testament writers. There is no word in all Greek literature with the exact meaning of this word. A new word had to be coined, or a new meaning had to be injected into an old word, to express the nobler, sublimer, and diviner thought of Christianity. Jesus Christ revolutionized architecture, law, philosophy, science, government, literature, and language. Read the early Latin hymns. They possess a rhythm, a resonance, a majesty, a sublimity, not found in other literature of the time; and all these characteristics are fragrant with Christian thought. It is not too much to say that the leaven of Christ introduced into the linguistic meal of Greek and Latin thought, revolutionized both languages. Where these early Christian writers could find a word into which they could inject the new thought, they employed it; when they could not find a word large enough to hold the new wine of the kingdom of God, they made a new word. Here was a new and majestic force that was injected into, and hidden in, all the life of that time; and yet these far-seeing men, these philosophical thinkers, did not discover the presence of this new force. If they did discover it, they minimized it or they tried to deny its presence, and its power; and yet it revolutionized both Greece and Rome. It finally revolutionized and entirely transformed the barbarians who conquered Rome.

Permeating Power

I beg you to observe, as the third thought suggested by this text, that true religion is a pervasive and transforming power. The kingdom of Christ, in its inception and insignificance, was like the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, yet that stone ground to powder all opposing powers. The kingdom of Christ is represented as a grain of mustard seed, which is indeed the smallest of all seeds, but which afterward becomes a tree, in the branches of which the birds may lodge. The kingdom of Christ is dominating the world to-day, as never before since the Christ was born. It is marvelously interesting, and it is profoundly instructive, to see how the kingdom of Christ and the truth of that kingdom are injecting themselves into the thinking of men to-day.

There has arisen a class of men in our own country and in other countries who have denied the Virgin birth of Jesus Christ; but they have not removed difficulties by their denial. They are involved in greater difficulties because of their denial. They have not rid history of the Christ. How shall they account for Jesus Christ? I find it easier to accept the evangelical record of his birth, than to attempt to account for his life, if I deny that record. Here is Der Einzige; here is the unique One of the world. Account for this. You cannot account for him by heredity, you cannot by environment, you cannot by education; so far as we know, he never sat at the feet of the sages of India, or at the feet of the philosophers of Greece or of Rome. It is more likely that the light that shone in India emanated from Zion's Hill than the reverse. How shall you account for Jesus Christ? Here is a stream that flowed higher than any other stream that ever flowed through the human race. Water cannot rise higher than its source. I am utterly unable to account for the height to which that stream flowed, except as I go back and discover its source in the heart of God. The unicity of Christ's life demands a corresponding unicity in Christ's birth. Admitting the uniqueness of the birth, I find it easy to account for the uniqueness of the life.

But just at this time, when men are denying the possibility of the Virgin birth, science steps forward and suggests to us the new science known as parthenogenesis. I know that scientific men are not yet fully agreed regarding the possibilities of this new science. For myself, I have not a particle of doubt but that science will demonstrate, before many decades shall pass, the marvelous possibilities of parthenogenesis. These possibilities have been demonstrated already in certain lower forms of life; they will be demonstrated later in higher forms of life, in all probability. What are called miracles, are only miracles in our thought. To God's thought, nothing is natural as opposed to supernatural, or supernatural as opposed to natural. To God's thought, all things are natural or supernatural, as you may choose to select your terminology. It is only we who use these terms. The term supernatural is not Biblical; the opposite to natural in the Bible is spiritual, not supernatural. The supernatural may be over the natural, super, but is not against, not contra, natural.

Modern Miracles

A few years ago, we would have deemed talking from New York to Chicago by the long-distance telephone as utterly supernatural. Why? Because we did not know the laws of nature that are involved in such communication. We have discovered laws of nature, which, a few years ago, we did not know. He would be a very rash man who would say that we know all the laws of nature to-day. God has much more light yet to break forth from his Book which we call the Bible, and God has more light to break forth from his other great Book which we call Nature. Revelation is God's written Bible; Nature is God's unwritten Bible. They are both God's Bibles; in revelation, the light is brighter, the voice is simpler and plainer and sweeter, but it is only one voice from whichever Book that voice proceeds. Be patient, be trustful, be hopeful. Jesus Christ will not be dethroned. Jesus Christ rules the world to-day, and will continue to rule the world in all future years.

Just when men denied the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body, science came forward modestly offering her proofs as to the truth of both. There was a time when science was defiant, agnostic, even atheistic. There may be scientists still who are agnostic and atheistic; but there are other scientists who are theistic and even Christic. There is a whole school of scientists earnestly at work to establish, if possible, from a scientific point of view, the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and of the resurrection of the body. Some of us, perhaps, do not need the demonstrations of these scientists; others do need them and will accept them. These are trained scientists, with keen perception, and with inspiring ambition to discover these great truths, and to establish them by demonstrations of science. Here is a hidden force at work, a new leaven, the leaven of a Christic science to establish Christian truth. And the great world of agnosticism is ignorant of these facts, just as ignorant as the great world of Greece and Rome was ignorant in the early day regarding this new force that had entered into the social, the philosophical, the literary and the religious life of their time.

A Dominant Force

Observe, as I close, that this new force is to be dominant and finally triumphant, "till the whole is leavened." You observe that the pervasive character of the leaven is seen in that it touches the meal contiguous to its particles, and this meal is transformed into leaven, and it goes on touching all the other particles of meal contiguous to itself. There can be no finer illustration of the spirit of Christianity than that here indicated.

There is a marvelous inscription on a mosque in Damascus. Damascus, you know, is supposed to be, and it probably is, the oldest city in the world. There, in a great quadrangle, is a superb mosque. It is larger than

AN INTERNATIONAL WEDDING

THERE are but few people even in this matter-of-fact world who will not display some interest in a wedding, even when the happy couple are personally unknown to them. Even the most crusty bachelor has been caught at times reading the full account in the newspapers, including the description of the bride's gown. If the bride or groom belong to some family of historic note, or the young woman has given her hand to some scion of the European nobility, the public interest in the wedding is even greater.

So many daughters of Columbia have married prominent Englishmen, Frenchmen, and Germans, that the announcement of such a bridal is beginning to be taken as much a matter of course. It is seldom, however, that there has been an intermarriage between a Hungarian and an American, so the recent wedding of Miss Gladys Vanderbilt, daughter of the late Cornelius Vanderbilt, to Count Laszlo Szechenyi, of Hungary, is a noteworthy event. Miss Vanderbilt comes from a family famous for its wealth and for the part it has played in the commercial development of America from the days of the old Commodore Vanderbilt, of Staten Island. Miss Vanderbilt made her home with her mother in New York and at Newport. She has spent much time in Europe, and it was during a tour of Austria-Hungary a little over a year ago that she met the young count. Later they were his guests in the feudal castle that belongs to him in Hungary. The young people became engaged at that time, but not a whisper of it got to the ears of the general public until Count Szechenyi landed on the dock in New York last fall.

The wedding took place in the Vanderbilt city mansion at Central Park Plaza and Fifth Avenue. The house is one of the most beautiful of the millionaire palaces which line that famous thoroughfare. It is of red brick and gray stone, built like a French chateau of the sixteenth century.

The invited guests numbered three hundred. They represented not only social leaders of the metropolis, but diplomats, statesmen and members of the Hungarian nobility. The dresses of the ladies had all been made weeks before especially for the occasion, and the display of jewels was dazzling, and probably could not have been equaled at any social event in the Old World. After laying aside their wraps, the guests were taken by elevator to the main hall. This runs the entire length of the house, and it was decorated with festoons of Southern smilax, ferns and palms. Here Mrs. Alfred Vanderbilt, sister-in-law of the bride, received. She wore a large hat of blue touched with gold, while her gown was a robin-egg blue. From the hall the guests entered the drawing-room where the ceremony was to take place. The room itself is one which art and good taste had done all possible to make beautiful, but now it had been turned into a floral bower, hand he carried his cap of white fur with a plume over a foot long.

The voices of the choir rose higher in the beautiful music of the cantata "Ruth," and the bridal procession came down the grand staircase, and entered the drawing room. They passed through a garden path made of high palms and jars of flowers. Two bridesmaids led in ivory white princess gowns with white silk girdles. They wore necklaces of pearls, and large hats with pink plumes. A little flower girl of ten followed, and then came the bride leaning on the arm of her brother, Cornelius Vanderbilt. She wore a princess gown of white satin, and the same veil that her mother had worn on her wedding day. In one hand she carried a prayer book of white and gold, and in the other a bouquet of white orchids and orange blossoms.

The ceremony was brief and impressive, and at the closing words of the benediction the orchestra began the strains of Gounod's triumphal march, to which the bridal party moved to the adjoining room, where the reception was held.

The count and countess managed to elude their waiting friends, who expected them to depart in a carriage waiting at the door. They, unobserved, entered an automobile, and were whisked away for the honeymoon to an estate on Long Island. Later they will go to the family castle in Hungary.

the mosque of Omar in Jerusalem. It was once a Christian church; but was transformed, like Saint Sophia in Constantinople, into a Mohammedan mosque. Strangely enough, the inscription over one of the principal doors has been allowed to remain. The inscription is this: "Thy kingdom, O Christ, is an everlasting kingdom, and thy dominion endureth throughout all generations." Is not that a remarkable inscription to be on a Mohammedan mosque? All the discoveries of science and art are making the fulfilment of that prophecy believable. There never was a time when discoveries reaching into all departments of human thought were so deeply tintured with the spirit of Christ, as they are to-day.

All art, in its noblest forms, is Christian; all music, in its most enduring elements, is Christian. But for Christ, there would be no Bach, no Beethoven, no Haydn, no Handel, and no Mendelssohn. But for Christ there would have been no Canova, no Angelo, no Raphael. But for Christ there would have been no Saint Peter's, no Saint Paul's. But for Christ, no Shakespeare, no Milton, no Tennyson, no Browning, no Longfellow, no Lowell. But for Christ there would have been no telegraphs, no railways, no steamships, no wireless telegraphy. But for Christ there would be no electricity. Electricity is a spark from the eternal Flame; electricity is a messenger from God's throne; electricity is a flash from God's face. It is God's hand that touches the button of the universe. There never was a time when these elements were so numerous and impressive as to-day. Christianity is to spread from pole to pole. There are no closed gates in Tibet, and no sealed doors in Africa. The Cape-to-Cairo Railway is to revolutionize Africa. In 1857, an East India Company director said that he would rather welcome the devil than a missionary in India. There are no directors of that kind among us to-day, thank God! They were fools when they were alive. The men of China and India and Africa, all uncovered their heads at the same moment, when President McKinley's body was laid in the grave. God has made the world a whispering gallery; he has made it resplendent with his glory, and vocal with his praise.

King William IV. died in 1837, and it was thirty-five days before America knew that he was dead. Queen Victoria died in 1901, at 2:30 in the afternoon, and that evening there were pages in the New York papers on her beautiful character and her noble life. In 1859 it took one hundred and forty-seven days to go from New York to Shanghai; now we go in twenty-five days. A generation and a half ago we were all reading Jules Verne's book, Around the World in Eighty Days. It seemed marvelous; it seemed Utopian. Now, since the Siberian Railway has been completed, we can go around the world in thirty-three days and a half. The Burmese Irrawaddy will soon see railways on its shores, which will carry us to Bhamo and to Mandalay. Now you go by rail from Jaffa to Jerusalem, and from Damascus to Beirut. Soon you will go by rail from Damascus to Mecca, to Nineveh, where Jonah preached, and to Babylon, where Nebuchadnezzar set up his great image. These are marvelous days in which to be alive. You can go now from Glasgow to Stanley Falls in twenty-three days. On January 26, 1885, after holding back the infuriated hordes for over ten months for reinforcements, which were within two days' march of the place, "Chinese" Gordon died, a martyr, at Khartum. To-day you go from Cairo to Khartum, 575 miles, on a railway train, with sleeping and dining-cars.

God is revolutionizing this world in the interest of Jesus Christ. Wireless telegraphy! I stand in awe of the wonders of the Almighty. Forward, O Jesus Christ, crowned King, triumphant Nazarene, diademed Immanuel! Oh, give us a place in lowly reverence at thy feet, and then give us a place to work in humble joy in thy vineyard; and then, at the last, may we cast our crowns in heaven at the feet of Jesus Christ!

Mme. Wu, Chinese Minister's Wife

THREE handsomely gowned women sat over a small tea-table in one of the fashionable West End homes of Washington, discussing a Sunday reception they expected to give shortly.

"There is no use asking the wife of Senator S. to pour tea for us," said the younger of the trio. "Her Puritanical views are too pronounced. We'd only invite a 'turn down' by asking her."

"That's so," said the gray-haired woman opposite, "but you would think, with her elegant home and with the entree she has everywhere, that she'd get over her old-fashioned notions. She might as well get in line and keep open house on Sundays with the rest of the town, though, of course," she added with a little sigh, "some of us have had to stifle our consciences to do it."

"Nonsense!" returned the third woman impatiently. "We all live in such a rush now that conscience died long ago in the race. This list," referring to the papers lying on the table, "contains everybody who is worth while, and I guess we won't miss the few who stay at home."

While the foregoing conversation is, in a measure, a portrayal of Washington "society," yet it is by no means true that "everybody is in line" to disregard the commandment against Sabbath-breaking. There is no city in the Union where the environment tends more largely toward Sabbath-desecration, and no city where, in some respects at least, the day is more religiously observed. To the inexcusable shame of the District Commissioners and of Congress, which shares so largely in the District government, the city is practically without a Sunday-closing law. Building or construction of any kind can continue on Sunday, and shops can be kept open without a protest, if the owner so desire. In addition to the want of law, the cosmopolitan character of the population necessarily affects Sunday observance also. People from not only all parts of our own country, but from nearly every section of the globe, make their homes in Washington. In the rush of society life which this brings about, and which has been so marvelously accentuated in the past few years, it is not surprising that dinner-giving, receptions, teas, and other social functions have become a feature of the Lord's day.

Yet, despite this fact, Washington can truthfully be called a church-going community. The Sunday morning services in the churches are well attended. The President and Mrs. Roosevelt are habitual attendants at church on Sabbath mornings, and their example is very generally followed. The British embassy has always been exemplary in this respect. The late Lord Pauncefote and his family invariably occupied their pew in St. John's at the regular services. Ambassador Durand was well known for his religious character, and his young daughter took an active part in parish work. Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce are equally zealous in holding the embassy to its high standard. They have brought the embassy back to much of the old-time leadership and popularity it had under the Pauncefotes. Mrs. Bryce, who is a woman of culture and ability, and much younger than her distinguished husband, is greatly interested in educational and philanthropic enterprises. They are making the embassy a centre of the literary as well as the social life of the capital.

Much interest is felt in the return of the two Oriental ladies, Mme. Takahira, the wife of the recently appointed ambassador from Japan, and Mme. Wu, whose husband is well remembered from his former residence here. Mme. Takahira left Washington that she might engage in the work of relief for the soldiers during the Japanese-Russian war, and she is closely identified with the philanthropic societies of her own land. Mme. Wu is in the van with the progressive movements which are stirring not only the men, but the women also of the Flowery Kingdom. Rumor has preceded her that she is in such harmony with the reform party that she has already had her feet unbound.

Mme. Creel, the wife of the Mexican ambassador, who is returning to his native land for a short time, is another popular hostess of the diplomatic corps. Her Tuesday receptions have been notable for the distinguished people they have drawn all through the season. Like almost all, the South American diplomatists, Ambassador and Mme. Creel are devoted to their church. Both Mme. Portela, the wife of the Argentine minister, and Mme. Diaz, the new chatelaine of the Chilean legation, are active church workers in their home-land. "We miss that part of life here in Washington," said the wife of a South American minister lately. "Seemingly the North American people confine their religion to Sunday; but with us, our religion is a part of everything we do. We go to church at some hour every day, and any woman who has the time must be identified with some branch of the work of the church. We miss our religious life here." Which certainly was a severe, although unconscious, reflection on us as a Christian people.

Notwithstanding all differences of opinion on the subject, the White House is the social centre of Washington, and this has never been more true than under the present administration. Mrs. Roosevelt fills her official position with a gracious hospitality that is felt and appreciated throughout the country. It is she who sets the social activities in motion when, soon after Congress convenes in December, she begins receiving calls. Everybody who is in the official circle leaves cards at the White House, and many who are not in it, for both the President and Mrs. Roosevelt have scores of friends among "the cave-dwellers," as the permanent residents of the town are called. The "First Lady's" duties are not light, nor are those of any of the women who come under the broad term "official." Their mornings are filled with subscription musicales, recitals, board and committee meetings of every kind, to say nothing of home duties. There are the ever-to-be-given luncheons and teas, and the never-ending calls (one cabinet minister's wife has already made two thousand of these calls this winter!). Then the nights are filled with dinner and all other kinds of parties, until it is small wonder that there is but little time left "for either soul, mind, or body culture," as one weary woman expressed it.

The Fairbanks household is one of deserved popularity in Washington. Mrs. Fairbanks' "Wednesdays" are more largely attended than any other, save the White House receptions. Rich and poor alike are welcomed to them, and the Vice-President and their attractive daughter often receive with Mrs. Fairbanks. As busy as she is, Mrs. Fairbanks has not allowed her social duties to crowd out her religious and charitable activities. Both the Vice-President and herself are members of the Methodist Church, and take an active part in it. For years she has been the President of the Junior Republic, an organization for the uplift of wayward boys, and is connected with many other charitable bodies. The Speaker of the House of Representatives and Miss Cannon also maintain one of the most hospitable homes in the national capital. In his boyhood, Mr. Cannon was reared as a Quaker, and he has never given over his allegiance to the faith of the Friends; but in his busy life he has not found time to be much of a churchman.

Among the Cabinet women, Mrs. Strauss has undoubtedly been more largely engaged in philanthropy than any of her sisters in the President's official family. She is the dispenser of the Baroness Hirsch Fund for Working Girls, and for years, until her removal to Washington, she devoted the greater part of her time to it. Through the generosity of the Baroness, two homes have been established in New York City, and while primarily for those of Jewish extraction, they are open to all needy girls. Secretary and Mrs. Garfield came into a goodly heritage when he was made Secretary of the Interior last year. While he was winning this promotion, they were living in the most unostentatious manner at the capital, but making a host of friends.

Their four bright boys were placed in the city schools, and with them the father and mother were regular attendants at a nearby church, a practice they still continue, as far as the Secretary's busy life will allow. Mrs. Garfield is a woman of broad culture and firm principles. Bridge whist, although so fashionable just now, is one of the things she absolutely eschews. She says she has not time for it—a statement which her busy life bears out. With all her arduous duties, she finds time to serve on the Boards of the Garfield Hospital and the Episcopal Eye and Ear Infirmary, and is a warm supporter of the effort being made to enlist federal help to secure a better home for the boys of the Junior Republic.

While neither the War Secretary nor Mrs. Taft have membership in any church, they both are in thorough sympathy with church organizations and have always helped in church support. The Secretary's parents were Unitarians, and, when possible, he affiliates with ciation of Washington; a member of the Rector's Aid Society of St. Margaret's, and president of a circle of ten for helping the poor. Like all the leading official women, she is in constant demand as patroness of charitable entertainments.

In the Senatorial circle there are many women who are widely known for their religious and philanthropic activities. Both Senator and Mrs. Foraker are members of the Methodist Church. When they first came to Washington, ten years ago, they lived near Dupont Circle, where a little Methodist chapel then stood. Some one asked Mrs. Foraker where they would attend church. She named this chapel, and upon the inquirer's expressing surprise, she said simply: "Why not? It is a small church, and we may be of some help to it, and that is what we are Christians for, isn't it?" A principle which has always actuated Mrs. Foraker is her helpfulness, which is widely known among her friends. For a number of years she was on the Boards of the Home and Foreign Mission Societies of the Methodist Church, and until she came to Washington, gave them a great deal of her time.

Senator and Mrs. Knox are members of the Protestant Episcopal Church and are well known in its activities. Mrs. Knox won an impregnable position for herself socially while Mr. Knox was Attorney-General, and her popularity has not waned since she joined the Senatorial circle. The new Senator from Colorado, Mr. Guggenheim, has the distinction of being one of the richest men in the "Millionaires' Club," the United States Senate. The family have taken a handsome house on Massachusetts Avenue, where they have commenced to entertain elaborately.

Among the Workers

—THE CHELTON HALL Gospel meetings, held under the auspices of the Whosoever Gospel Mission, Germantown, Pa., are proving very successful.

—MR. J. CHENOWETH, of Muscatine, Ia., writes that Evangelist Sunday's meetings in that city were most successful. "All the saloons closed permanently (35 in number), because the law of Iowa requires a petition of 51 per cent. of the voters for consent, and this they cannot get."

—THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS of the Y.M.C.A., Hudson City branch, N. J., adopted a resolution expressing "deepest sorrow and dismay" at the removal from the coins of the motto "In God We Trust," and respectfully but sincerely petitioning the President to reconsider his decision and cause the motto to be restored.

—PASTOR SHELDON, of Topeka, Kan., writes of his Tennesseetown settlement work: "We have just received word from the Jamestown Exposition that our exhibit there has received a silver medal and very honorable mention. The managers of the Negro Building have requested that our material, which the children made with their own hands, be left with them for a future exhibit."

that body. Mrs. Taft's family were Presbyterian, but since her marriage she has worshiped usually with the Episcopalians. She was always actively engaged in the philanthropic and civic organizations of Cincinnati. It was largely through her efforts that the Training School for Nurses was established, and for years she was a member of the Free Kindergarten Board. As a girl she had decided musical talent, and she helped to found and maintain the famous Orchestra of Cincinnati. While in the Philippines, Mrs. Taft was a member of the Soldiers' and Sailors' League, which established the public library at Manila.

While they were children in school, in the Hempstead, L. I., Institute, both Secretary of the Treasury and Mrs. Cortelyou joined the Methodist Church and for many years continued their membership there. When they came to Washington it chanced that their residence was near an Episcopal church and the children were sent there to Sunday School. Young Bruce, who inherits his father's gift of music, was soon singing in the choir, and the other members of the family began taking up church duties. Mrs. Cortelyou, notwithstanding many domestic and social duties, manages to carry on a great deal of church and charitable work. She is a director in the Young Women's Christian Asso-

Progress in the Churches

THE latest statistics of the churches of the United States furnished by Dr. H. K. Carroll of the Government Census Bureau through the Christian Advocate, present many significant features. It appears from an analysis of the tables that the largest single denomination in the country, next to the Roman Catholic, which is not numbered, but only estimated and therefore a mere guess, is the Methodist Episcopal, which has 3,036,667 communicants. It has also more than double the number of churches that the Roman Catholics have—27,965 against 12,482.

In actual gains for the year, the Baptists stand at the head of the list. Their gains, counting all branches of the denomination, were 103,358, a greater number than is shown by the Methodists of all branches, which is stated at 101,696. Next in order as to the number gained during the year, is the Lutheran Church with 65,172, and next the Presbyterian Churches with 49,627, raising their present roll to 1,821,504. The Disciples of Christ record an increase of 20,365, bringing the total number to 1,285,123. Comparing the figures with those of 1890 we notice that there has been only one change in the order of the denominations, based on the present number of communicants. The Lutherans, formerly fourth on the Protestant list, have now reached the third place, which was formerly held by the Presbyterians. The order is now: Methodist, Baptist, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Disciples of Christ, Episcopal, Congregational, United Brethren, and Reformed Dutch. All of these have more than 100,000 communicants.

Omitting from the list such bodies as Roman Catholics, Jews, Mormons and others not properly belonging to evangelical denominations, it would appear that there are 193,707 churches, 141,889 ministers and 20,803,879 communicants in this category in the United States.

The estimated population of the United States based on the normal increase since the census, the immigration returns, etc., is 86,429,000. Deducting from this total the number of infants we have a number of adults which in comparison with the number of communicants suggests serious reflections. How much ground still remains to be possessed! Apart from the classes omitted from the calculation, how large a number of our population are practically pagans, holding aloof from the churches, and in spite of the regular preaching of the Gospel and of individual effort, not numbered among the followers of Christ!

St. Valentine's Day

ALTHOUGH the snow may be heaped in white drifts and the wild northeasters blow their fiercest gales, the first note of spring is annually sounded on the 14th of February, when Cupid has his innings on St. Valentine's Day. The old Romans thought that date the one when the mating of the birds began, and before the Christian era the day was a pagan festival, joy and mirth coming in with the singing of the birds.

The Church of Rome early appropriated to her own use heathen gala days, setting on them the seal of her wisdom and converting them into Christian feast days. Probably few of the young people who exchange gifts and greetings, touched with lover-like devotion in mid-February, pause to remember that the happy day perfumed with an attar of courtesy had its origin in the death of a Christian martyr. St. Valentine was beheaded for the Saviour's sake in the reign of Claudius II., A.D. 270. Thus the rose of modern love springs perennially and blossoms evermore from roots that were bedewed with the blood of a fearless and saintly knight of the Cross. He well deserves a place in the calendar, this good St. Valentine. He was one of those martyrs who aided in life and death, by witness-bearing and sacrifice, to the uplifting of the Christian church. Later a cathedral was built in his honor by Pope Julius, and his memory was further immortalized in a gate called Porta St. Valentini, now called Porta del Popolo.

So much for history. Suppose we look at St. Valentine's Day as it has had its ebbs and floods in our own time. Men and women whose heads are white recall with ease its universal celebration in the golden period of their youth. We may remind ourselves without straining a point that there is a certain sacredness in the thought that love and home are inseparably blended in the sentiment of St. Valentine's day. Beneath its light persiflage there is a granite basis. Springtime and the mating of birds suggests nest-building and the making of homes. The nests in the tree-tops and the meadow grass are but for a season; but the nests that true lovers build when they have exchanged solemn vows that make permanent the family, are sacramental, and should have no shorter tenure than life itself.

It is a happy sign of the times that in current fiction there is a marked return to the simplicity of a generation ago, and that clean and wholesome stories are at present issuing from the press. Books that may be read aloud in the family without raising a blush on the cheek of youth or maiden, are a positive good, and take their place in daily life as preachers of righteousness. All hail to them and to the blithe day of the sweetest saint in the calendar, the fearless old St. Valentine!

Religious Faddists

OUR country has witnessed in recent years a startling multiplication of religious fads and faddists. In almost every community nowadays one may find little groups of the disciples of some new belief; yet not always new, for many of them are simply ancient sophistries warmed over and garnished anew to meet modern demands.

It has become fashionable among a certain class to be known as students of some freak philosophy, the very name of which is itself a puzzle to the uninitiated. They are like those Athenians to whom Paul preached, who "spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell or to hear some new thing." So to-day, we have the Meticulturists, the Soul Culturists, the Higher Thought, the Spiritualists and Hypnotists, the Hermetic Scientists, the Vedantists, Theosophists, Yogis, Babists and many more of the same sort, all catering to those who love to dabble in that delusive, bewildering will-o'-the-wisp occultism, so dear to dreamers and esoterics.

For the honest seeker after truth, men have a wholesome respect; but the faddist is not to be classed with the sincere inquirer. He is simply a searcher after novelties, eager for a new sensation and ready to welcome anything that caters to his vanity and his love of the mysterious. Such a one will tell you that the solar plexus is "the radiating focus of life, the centre of consciousness and power, from which the divine energy flows;" another declares that the concentrated human will can conquer everything; and still another will gravely affirm that religion consists in keeping the body in perfect health and the mind free from care and worry. Then there is a truly wonderful curriculum, which includes posturings, silences, deep breathings, magic words and invocations addressed to "the Om," and much other mysterious doings sweet to the soul of the egotist and the credulous.

It has always been a distinguishing mark of human weakness to run after strange gods. Wiser far and happier is the simple, steadfast soul, that stands firmly by "the old-time religion," faith in God and in his Son, Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world. It was a good enough religion for our fathers and mothers to live and die by, and it should be good enough for their children, since it is the eternal truth of God. In the severe tests of life, when all freak religions fail, the religion of Jesus Christ cheers and sustains us; it consoles us in sickness, sorrow and bereavement, and, in the last hour, it robs death and the grave of their terror, and turns our departure into a triumph.

A Woman's View of the Canteen

THERE have been so many different and conflicting views published concerning the army canteen—some of them not without suspicion of personal interest—that the opinion of one who is thoroughly familiar with the practical side of the question, and whose judgment is influenced only by solicitude for the best welfare of the soldiers themselves, will be welcomed.

From Mrs. L. M. Maus, the wife of an American army officer now stationed in Manila, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a communication which has the merit of frankness as well as of thorough familiarity with the subject. Mrs. Maus has talked with many enlisted men about the canteen, and she writes:

I have been much surprised to hear them resent the statement made by some older officers that all soldiers drink. The officers who think this do not know the young soldier of to-day. He is a very different man from the soldier of fifteen or twenty years ago. Many of these men were foreigners. Our men are very young Americans, in many cases country-bred boys, who even prefer milk to coffee. . . . One fine young boy asked me if the ladies who were writing those articles headed, "Give them back their beer," thought they were German soldiers, or if they themselves would buy homes next door to those saloons and allow their boys to drink and expect them to turn out good, sober men. Most of the men say that the credit system and drinking for the benefit of the company is the worst feature of it all. . . . Many fine young men have come to grief from this system.

She relates that at one large post, during canteen days, less than $700 was sent home by the soldiers; but three months after the abolishing of beer, they sent away to their homes $3,000! This alone would seem to be a conclusive argument against the canteen, as showing how it encourages spendthrift habits among the men. But there is an even worse aspect to the matter.

"Our soldiers say," Mrs. Maus continues, "that the army will not enlist them as drinking men, yet it encourages them in forming the drinking habit." She estimates that, in companies averaging fifty men each, at least forty are opposed to spending their money in this way, and resent being classed as drinkers. Even the colored troops consider it beneath them to be so regarded. Soldiers' wives have appealed to her to urge the commanding officers that their husbands be not allowed canteen checks for their pay.

Mrs. Maus laments the lack of patriotism on the part of Americans in their regard for the welfare of the soldiers, and she adds:

I feel I would be disloyal to the better element of our army, the thousands of self-respecting soldiers, should I not present their cause, or should I keep silent on this subject.

There has been much oratory and endless discussion about the canteen, yet we do not believe that any one has a better right to a hearing than this Christian woman, who now points out the moral dangers that beset the path of the American soldier, and shows how these may be removed.

Congress and the Motto

CONGRESSMAN SHEPPARD of Texas, who introduced one of the bills for the restoration of the motto on the coins, and who is taking a very active part in the movement, sends this excellent suggestion, which we heartily commend to our readers and to all who believe that we, as a nation, should acknowledge God upon our coinage:

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.
WASHINGTON, D. C.

"EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: The Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures of the House of Representatives is now considering bills to restore the motto, In God We Trust, upon the coins of the United States.

"I observe that your great paper, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is very much interested in this question of the restoration of this motto upon our coins. You are evidently in touch with many citizens who believe as you do in this important matter. Now is the time to bring every possible influence to bear on the above Committee, in behalf of the restoration of the motto. I wish every clergyman in the United States, as well as every other citizen, would write the members of this Committee at Washington in behalf of the motto. Very truly,
"MORRIS SHEPPARD."

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

New York's Police Dog Squad

A NOVEL experiment is now being tried by the metropolitan police. Last summer, one of the officers of the department visited Belgium, where the police employ trained dogs to aid in the hunt for criminals. Four of these very intelligent animals were brought to New York, and under the personal care of Lieutenant Wakefield, they are rapidly developing remarkable cleverness. In a recent trial, the four dogs—who are named Nogi, Jim, Max and Dona—were taken to the Parkville police station near Coney Island, where they were lined up at midnight before the desk by the lieutenant and his assistant, Policeman McDonald. They were placed in charge of Policemen Key, O'Day, Nicholson and Skelly, in the order named, and, muzzled and held in leash, were sent forth to duty. Lieutenant Wakefield, by way of showing how well trained the animals were, made a feint as though attacking one of the policemen. Jim, who was in charge of the policeman—although the lieutenant had been his teacher—rose instantly on his hind legs and planted his front paws on the lieutenant's chest with such force as to send him into a snowbank. Jim held his man down with his paws, in the chill snow, until he was dragged away. The dogs are familiar with the police uniform and recognize an officer immediately, though they make no distinction in his favor if he happens to be in civilian dress. They attack swiftly and heavily, and can easily knock a man down by jumping at him with their forepaws. They will not bite, unless the person attacked shows violence. They will stand over the prostrate offender until ordered off by their masters. They are taught to circle, to catch by the legs, heels or clothing, and to do everything quietly. They will be taken out on night tours here, as is the custom in Belgium, and will be on duty side by side with the policemen in dangerous districts. That they will be a permanent and valuable ally of the police, in dealing with crime in the great metropolis, is confidently claimed by those who are familiar with their use in Europe.

One of the dogs was attached to the Parkville station in Brooklyn, which includes a large, sparsely inhabited area. His usefulness there was demonstrated on the first night that he went out without a leash. He ran into the station in a state of excitement, and expressed, as plainly as a dog could, his desire for a policeman to go out with him. There was no doubt of his meaning, so a policeman went out and the dog led him to a vacant lot, where, behind a high fence, a man lay asleep in the snow. He had evidently been drinking, and would probably have died of cold and exposure before morning if the dog had not found him. The dog knew, better than the man himself, that he needed saving. Like some sinners disturbed by the Gospel call, the man needed to be awakened and roused from fatal somnolence.

Wherefore he saith, Awake thou that sleepest and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light. (Eph. 5: 14.)

Wireless for the Battlefield

Experiments in Germany have convinced the Government that valuable aid may be given to an army in the field by wireless telegraphy. Members of the Government and army staff went from Berlin to Nauen to witness the achievement that the experiments have proved possible. A movable wireless station was set up in fifteen minutes, consisting of jointed poles, with connecting wires, to which a Morse instrument was attached. Simultaneously a similar erection was made at a place twenty miles distant, and communication was immediately established. The station was taken down and set up in another position and again it worked easily. The officer in charge said that this distance was by no means the limit of the system. It would be possible, he claimed, to get perfect communication in an emergency, at stations sixty-five miles apart, and these stations could be set up anywhere in fifteen minutes. It is obvious that this system will be most advantageous to outposts and to detached commands. An officer equipped with this movable wireless apparatus will be able to communicate with the commander-in-chief, giving him timely intimation of a sudden attack and of his need of succor. The Christian in the world has, in prayer, just such a means of obtaining help.

They cried unto the Lord in their trouble and he delivered them out of their distresses, and he led them forth by the right way. (Ps. 107: 6, 7.)

Saved by a Brave Girl

A seventeen-year-old girl recently did an heroic thing in the village on Long Island where she lives. She was in an upper room of her home removing her out-door attire after a walk, when glancing through the window she saw a boy coast rapidly on his sled past the house. She was alarmed, for she knew that if his sled should take a course to a path on the right of the road, it would reach a pond then covered with a thin sheet of ice. The boy, who could not have been more than ten years old, had evidently lost control of the sled. She watched him from the window and to her horror saw that he was headed for the pond. There was no one at hand that she could call to the rescue, so she rushed downstairs and tions were as described. But the explanation was simple: the guest had not pressed the electric button that turned on the lights, but, instead, had pressed the one that started a powerful electric fan. The room, as the guest said, was uninhabitable, dark and cold, but the fault was his own. The same may be said of many who complain most bitterly of their lot, and of the providence of God, who assigns them their place in the world. They lay the blame for their misery upon him instead of on their own mistakes, which are frequently faults. It would be a happier world for all of us did we take the right way to get light and avoid the acts that bring upon us the blasts of adversity. Of too many of us it may be said as of ancient Israel:

Your iniquities have turned away these things and your sins have withholden good things from you. (Jer. 5: 25.)

A Long Feud Ended

Two farmers in the western part of New York State, who occupy adjoining farms, have been enemies for more than ten years. They were formerly friends, but a dispute arose over a fence and they went to law about it. After a long course of litigation, one of them was beaten, and had to pay heavy damages. He was very angry about it, and vowed that he would never speak to his neighbor again as long as he lived. Though he met him nearly every day in his work, the old grudge still rankled, and during the ten years that have passed, he has kept his word and has never spoken to his neighbor. One day recently, however, he was trying a new horse, and the animal ran away. He was thrown out of his buggy, and, as he lay on the road holding to the reins, was in imminent danger of being killed. The only man who saw the accident was the man whom he had vowed never to speak to. Forgetting all about the quarrel, this man ran to his relief, and doubtless saved his life. Thereupon the rescued man broke his vow, and heartily thanked his neighbor for his aid. He went further, and begged his forgiveness, and the two men are now good friends. The man in need of a service, though he be an enemy, or a stranger, or a man who has done us a wrong, has a special claim upon us if we would live according to the spirit of Christ.

I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you . . . that ye may be the children of your Father who is in heaven. (Matt. 5: 44, 45.)

Hittite Literature Found

The German Orient Society, exploring in Asia Minor, reports the discovery of a number of clay tablets, which it believes formed part of a Hittite library. If this theory proves to be correct, the tablets will probably be a valuable contribution to our knowledge of this little known people. Few of them have been deciphered as yet, but sufficient is seen of them to show that some contain records over three thousand years old. One, of peculiarly elaborate type, contained a treaty between an unknown king of the Hittites and Rameses II., the king of Egypt who was the oppressor of the Israelites. An interesting fact that Dr. Winckler, the leader of the expedition, makes clear is that women played an important part in politics in those days. He cites a letter sent by the wife of Rameses to her royal sister of the Hittites commenting on the treaty and expressing her satisfaction at its ratification. It is quite possible that the writer of this letter may have been the Princess who found and adopted Moses and afterwards became the beloved wife of Rameses. It is significant that at this period, when so much doubt is being expressed as to the historical accuracy of the Bible, corroboration is coming from so many strange sources. The words of the prophet are being fulfilled in our time:

Seek ye out of the book of the Lord and read: no one of these shall fail, none shall want her mate; for my mouth it hath commanded, and his spirit it hath gathered them. (Isa. 34: 16.)

down the road the sled had taken. Neither boy nor sled was in sight, but the ice on the pond was broken up and she concluded that the boy was in the water. Instantly she followed, though she knew that the icy water would reach her shoulders. She broke up the ice further out and had the gratification of seizing the boy, then insensible from cold and shock, and bringing him safely to the bank. It is said that neither she nor the boy will be likely to suffer serious results from the immersion. But for the girl's prompt action the little fellow would probably have perished. The experience should make him careful in years to come, how he takes the downward path. There are some such paths that have a peril worse than the pond at the foot, and it is not always that there is some one near that to save.

There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death. (Prov. 14: 12.)

A Guest's Mistake

A visitor to New York from an agricultural neighborhood made an indignant complaint to the clerk of a fashionable hotel at which he was staying on the first night of his visit. The clerk was aroused at five o'clock in the morning by a ring on the telephone, which communicated with the stranger's room. The guest complained that he was unable to dress, owing to the impossibility of getting a light and to the fearful draughts that made him shiver and his teeth chatter. He gave vent to his exasperation that in an expensive apartment, at an hour later than his usual time of rising, he was obliged to grope around in the dark, in a wind that would not be borne in a common shed in his home town. A uniformed page was sent up to his room and found that the condi-

A LORD'S DAY IN THE LORD'S LIFE

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

A HELPLESS invalid brought daily and laid beside a healing spring, a man who has been sick for thirty-eight years, alternating between hope and disappointment, this is the subject of our study. The spring or pool is Bethesda, at Jerusalem. It has five porches about it, like the pavilions of to-day at Saratoga and other famous springs; but unlike them, for sick folks only and the friends who minister to them. The man of our character sketch was a poor man, for he said: "I have no man to put me into the pool." He was probably carried there by charitably disposed neighbors, who then went on their way to their daily tasks, and called on their return to bring him again to his home. They had done this since so long, that they always expected to find him in the evening just where they had left him in the morning. But there came a day when they looked for him at evening in vain. We can imagine how they looked about for him among the sick folk lying there.

A Hopeless Sufferer

How thrilling must have been the story, as it was told to them on the spot! How Jesus had come into the porches, with love and sympathy for the sick in their affliction, and how the most distressed and helpless one among them had received his special attention. It was not the sick man who called upon Jesus for help, but it was Jesus who asked him if he did not desire to be made well. That hope was dead in the heart of the man is shown by the despair in his answer, which was a complaint that he did not have the same chance as others. Jesus did not turn away in disgust because of his pettishness, but spoke the word of power that brought immediate health and strength to the sufferer: "Rise, take up thy bed and walk." And the man rose and took up his bed and walked away from Bethesda, probably starting for home that he might show himself to his dear ones and deposit his bed.

In the first moments of surprise at his recovery, Jesus had departed. And when some of the Jews met him by the way and asked him who had cured him, he was unable to tell, for he "wist not who it was." It speaks well for the man that he made a good use of his new-found strength by going to the Temple on that Sabbath day. There Jesus saw him and made himself known to him, and warned him against continuing his sinful ways, lest he should become more helpless than he had been before. The healed man left the Temple that he might find the Jews and answer their question by telling them that it was Jesus who had made him well. Were the Jews glad to hear that? Not they, because they were unfriendly critics. They took the opportunity to defame Jesus because he had healed the man on the Sabbath day. How blind they were in their zeal for the Sabbath! It only enraged them still further when they found Jesus and heard him proclaim the Sabbath as a day for good works. Healing they regarded as a desecration of the Sabbath, but hating to the very measure of murder on that day gave them no compunction. We may well turn to Rev. 1: 10: "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's Day," as a reminder that the most important part of Sabbath observance is to be in the right spirit in regard to all relations of life on that day.

Remedies That Fail

"Jesus went up to Jerusalem." In the lesson of two weeks ago Jesus was in Samaria, in that of last week he was in Galilee, and this week he is in Judea. This reminds us how he has been going from land to land through all the Christian centuries, until there is no country in the world in which the story of Christ has not been told, none in which he has not healed the souls of men. There are, however, millions who have not yet heard that wonderful story.

"A multitude of impotent folk waiting for the moving of the water." In all ages down to the present, people look to change of place, to some magic water or medicine, for the health that mostly depends on habits, just as many look to luck rather than labor for success. One Furius Cresinus, a Roman farmer, was accused to the judges of practicing witchcraft, on the ground that while his neighbors' fields were yielding but little, his were productive, and nothing but witchcraft they thought could account for it. The farmer, bringing before his judges his tools of husbandry—rude mattocks, rough ploughshares, strong oxen, and his daughter who helped him in his farm work, addressed the judges thus: "O Quirites, this daughter, these oxen, these tools are the instruments of

The Only Witchcraft

I use. It is diligence that succeeds, and it is because of idleness that my neighbors do not succeed." Not only financial success, but also health, depends very much upon industry. The United States Census report on tuberculosis says: "It may be anticipated that the growing knowledge of the fact that in pulmonary diseases, the benehealth-giving influences are gifts of God. And water is the greatest of medicines, as some of us have learned at water cures, where we have been taught when and how to drink it, and when and how to use it for baths. Americans drink more water and less alcohol, taking the people as a whole, than any other nationality; but strangely we have also developed the unhealthy "American ice habit," as British visitors are wont to call it. Christian teaching in pulpit and Sunday School should include a Christian's duty to his body, for diet and devotion act upon each other. Holiness is wholeness, which also gives us the word health; and to-day as of old, nature and Christ help us to health.

Where Help Fails

"A certain man was there who had an infirmity thirty and eight years." There is more in the story than is told. He could hardly hobble from the porch to the

"Jesus saith unto him, Rise, take up thy bed and walk" fits supposed to be derived from a change of climate are really due, in a large degree, to change in habits, through which a much larger proportion of the time is spent in the open air and sunshine, and that by the same means, aided by diet and rest, incipient cases can be successfully treated at home, will hereafter cause a decrease in mortality from tuberculosis." A leading American chemist once said that nearly all the benefits derived from going to famous springs could be secured by drinking from a plain spring half a mile from one's home in the same way, several glasses at a time, several times a day on an empty stomach, accompanied by exercise

Healing Waters

"For an angel went down at a certain season into the pool." It was no doubt an intermittent mineral spring of health-giving qualities. The popular belief was that an angel's coming prompted its ebullitions, and in a sense it was true, for all pool close by, and so he probably had been brought there daily from his home. And as no one stayed with him it seems also probable that it was not his own family that brought him, but kind neighbors who must go to their day's work after they had laid him near the healing waters. It was one of many cases where man's help falls short, and only divine help is sufficient. The man illustrates the great truth that Jesus only can save. Human friends had brought him to the porch. Christ must do the rest. We have no reason to suppose he would have been saved by Christ if his friends had not done their part. We can and should bring friends to church. Only Christ can heal their souls. We can preach the word. The Holy Spirit must carry it to the heart. Prayer is the coupler that connects the human and divine elements in a soul's transformation.

Dr. F. W. Baedeker, who lived to do a great work in Russia and Siberia in proclaiming the story of God's love to men, once met a Tartar, a Mohammedan, who addressed the following question to him: "What do you think of the prophet Mohammed?" "I have a much more important question for you than that," said the doctor. "It is, what do you think about sin?" "Oh, we are all sinners," replied the Mohammedan. "Can one sinner save another sinner?" "No." "But if he is a prophet?" "No." "Well, then, what are we to do—all sinners?" "I cannot tell." "I will tell you," replied Dr. Baedeker; "there is no power on earth that can save sinners except

The Power of the Lord

Christ, the One who died and rose again. He who knew no sin, was made sin for us." As the doctor went on to explain the Gospel, the Tartar bowed his head and his eyes filled with tears. He had never heard such words before! You have heard them often. Do you know by experience that wonderful power that saves?

"Wilt thou be made whole?" The man was so discouraged that he had almost ceased to hope. In saving him Christ illustrated the promise that he would not crush the bruised reed or quench the smoking flax. He saves even those of "little faith," answering the cry of his storm-tossed apostles to whom he had said, "How is it that ye have no faith?" and the plea of the father for his boy, who said, "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief." This story is one to encourage those of weak faith to hope and pray.

"While I am coming, another steppeth down before me." Was there murmuring or selfishness here? Why not rejoice that somebody was healed? It recalls the greatness of that little act of Sir Philip Sidney, on which his fame rests more than upon his literary or military triumphs. Badly wounded at Zutphen, he gasped for water; but as he was raising it to his lips, a private more severely wounded, who was being carried by, looked eagerly at the refreshing draught. Sir Philip quickly handed it to him, saying, "Thy need is greater than mine." Surely that was Christian knighthood in flower!

Power to Obey

"And immediately the man was made whole, and took up his bed, and walked." It was a simple act, but it involved both faith and obedience. Again and again Jesus told sick men to do what only a healed man could do. "Take up thy bed and walk." "Stretch forth thy hand." "Go and shew thyself to the priest." "As they went, they were cleansed." As they obeyed they were healed. Faith understood that "God's biddings are enablings," that in every command God enwraps a promise of strength sufficient to obey. Whenever you say at some new order from the Captain of our salvation, "I am not able," the Spirit answers, "He is able," "able to save to the uttermost," "able to make you stand," "able to do for us exceeding abundantly," and through us also. Carrying a bed was an act of obedience to Christ. Equally so it may be divine service to make a bed.

Teach me, my God and King,
In all things thee to see,
And what I do in anything,
To do it as to thee.

This is the famous stone
That turneth all to gold;
For that which God doth touch and own,
Cannot for less be told.

"The same day was the Sabbath" (read vv. 9-18). This was a fair sample of the way Jesus spent the Sabbath—not by doing nothing, but by doing good. Even in the twentieth Christian century there are many church members who do not seem to have learned what Jesus taught about the positive side of Sabbath observance, by miracles of healing on that day in every section of Palestine. Looking at the Lord's Day as seen in the Lord's life, it is not an "empty day," not merely or chiefly a day of rest and worship, but a day when work for gain is suspended to give work for God full swing. That is the truest rest, a change from the necessary selfish activities of the week to the self-forgetting service of God and our fellows; a day whose measure therefore should not be more scant than that of the six days we give to worldly labor and the service of self.

Faith's Power-House*

HOW astonished Watt and Stephenson and the engineers of the past would be, could they enter one of the "power-houses" in which the electricity is generated that supplies a city! They would be amazed to find that the agent that turns the wheels in our factories, and that carries the cars along the streets, furnishes us with light and with quick communication with distant lands. And the most astonishing thing to them would be that, when they were experimenting with steam, this agent that does so much for us was here all the time waiting to be used. They would be mortified to think how they had overlooked it. Is it possible that the time may come when the Christian will discover that he has similarly neglected the source of spiritual power? There would be the less excuse in his case, because he has been told of its existence and how to obtain it. Christ positively stated, when the disciples wondered at the withering of the fig-tree, that this power that had so amazed them, and other powers more desirable, were within their reach.

In faith and prayer Jesus said there were infinite possibilities. They afforded remedies for worry, for anxiety, for sorrow, and they were the channel through which came unlimited power for service. He used them and therefore he knew. "I can of myself do nothing," he said; "the Father doeth the works." And at another time he said, "Ye shall do greater works than these, because I go to the Father." He bids us go to the same infinite Source from which he drew his supplies and assures us that our drafts upon it will be honored. Only there must be sincerity and unselfishness. We must not seek it for our own advantage, nor with any wavering of faith. The supply is for all who seek in confidence and in sincerity. It is surprising that the proofs that have been given of its efficacy and of the certainty of its being conferred have not encouraged more to seek. God has honored in every age the faith that trusts him. Even in our own time there has been a conspicuous example. George Muller was ridiculed for his confidence, yet God justified it.

Foreign Mission Results*

EVERY Christian is justified in taking a pride in the special Foreign Mission work of his own denomination; but there is a new spirit now in this pride. Since the great assembly in New York eight years ago, of missionaries of all denominations, a more brotherly feeling has been born, and men now rejoice more cordially than before, in successes by whomsoever they are won. The old spirit of rivalry and hostility has disappeared, and has given place to emulation of the friendliest kind. It is possible that this spirit will extend so that while no denomination is excluded from any sphere, there will be a concentration of effort by mutual arrangement, so that a particular denomination shall regard a heathen land as its own special field, for the evangelization of which it is peculiarly responsible. This may come as a preliminary to the desirable condition in which in foreign lands, there shall be one church, and missionaries of all denominations labor together in the common cause.

The new statistics issued by the American Board show that our own country has thirty-six missionary organizations at work, with an aggregate force of 5,288 missionaries in the field, of whom 3,173 are women, and that last year the money raised for their support amounted to $8,997,970. This sum of course included the expense of literature and the support of native helpers, of whom 26,057 were employed. This was the largest income recorded, exceeding slightly the income of British societies, which was $8,747,759. It is worthy of notice that the British have a larger number of missionaries (6,526), though a smaller number of communicants. The progress made last year is also encouraging. The missionaries from the United States recorded 66,147 additions to the churches and the total number recorded by the entire force of missionaries of all nationalities was 137,714, bringing the entire number of communicants of all denominations to 1,598,644. These are scattered over the heathen lands of the whole world, the fruit of a century's labors.

THE FIRE AT PORTLAND

DURING the recent cold weather there seems to have been an unusual number of disastrous fires throughout the country from West to East. One paper, on its fortunately the flames were subdued before reaching it. The handsome City Hall, a building worth several hundred thousand dollars, was burned, and with it many things connected with the history of the city—pictures, documents, etc., of great value.

A number of the finest business blocks were destroyed, and the loss to the commercial and business interests of this thriving city will be felt for some time. For its size, Portland is one of the most important places on our Atlantic seaboard. In the winter months especially, it is a great outlet for Canadian products, and there is much traffic between it and Montreal. The business men have put themselves energetically to work to repair their losses and to rebuild the ruined structures. During the fire, some of the firemen were badly frozen, and it was necessary to bring the fire departments from several Maine cities to help quench the flames.

Does your skin dry, harden, roughen and crack when you venture out of doors in cold weather?

The trouble may be due to any one of several causes—wind; exposure of the face and hands after bathing them in warm water; or the use of a soap which is not properly made.

In any event, you should use Ivory Soap. Made of pure vegetable oils and containing no "free" (uncombined) alkali, it not only cleanses the skin, but it helps to keep it smooth, soft and healthy—in winter as well as in summer.

Money will not buy purer soap than Ivory. Many toilet soaps which find a ready sale at 15, 25 or even 50 cents a cake are not so pure.

The Washer That Sells Itself Send No Money

WE make no effort to sell our washers. We write no long letters, send no agents to tire you out with talk.

Our 1900 Gravity Washers sell themselves. And we let them do it. We let any responsible party have a 1900 Gravity Washer to use a month at our expense.

You don't send us a penny of money. Just agree to use the washer a month and we will ship it to you and prepay the freight.

Do four weeks' washings with the washer. Wash your finest linens and laces. Wash your heaviest blankets and quilts. Wash rugs.

Then—if you are not satisfied—if you cannot see how this washer saves time and work and clothes and money—don't keep it.

If our 1900 Gravity Washer will not sell itself to you this way, we do not expect you to keep it. Tell us you don't want the washer and that will settle the matter.

On the other hand—if you are pleased and satisfied with the washer—if you see how it saves your time—saves your strength—protects your health—reduces wear on your clothes—saves you mending—saves soap—and, by saving all these things, also saves more than enough money to pay for itself—then you can send us each week or each month a part of what the washer saves for you.

In a few months the 1900 Gravity Washer pays for itself this way. Then it is your own and keeps right on saving for you.

We take no risk in offering to let a 1900 Gravity Washer sell itself to you, because we know that our washers are the best.

And you take no risk in accepting our offer, because we do not ask you to send us a penny until after you have used the washer a full month—nor even then unless you decide to keep it. The whole story of these washers is told in our new illustrated Washer Book, showing how our washers are made and how they work.

The World's Oldest Methodist

MRS. MARY RAMSEY WOOD, familiarly known as "Grandma Wood," who died lately at the home of her daughter, at the great age of one hundred and twenty years, is said to have been the oldest Methodist, if not the oldest woman, in the world. From a reader in Sherwood (Mr. F. B. Clark), we have received the story of Grandma Wood's life. She was born at Knoxville, Tenn., May 20, 1787. At the age of 12 years she joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. She married Jacob Lemons in 1804, and bore the following children: Mary Jane Lemons, born in 1806, died 1894; Isaac Lemons, born in 1809, died 1866; Mrs. Nancy Lemons Bullock, born 1816, died 1868; and Mrs. Catherine Reynolds, born 1830, at whose home the aged woman resided for many years.

Mrs. Lemons moved from Tennessee to Alabama with her husband in 1837, and to Georgia in 1838. Lemons died the following year. In 1849 she moved to Missouri. In 1852 she crossed the plains to Oregon, riding the entire distance on horseback on a mare she had christened "Martha Washington Pioneer." She settled in Washington County, and on May 28, 1854, was married to John Wood, who died in the sixties.

Mrs. Wood came from English stock, her ancestors settling in the Carolinas. Her mother died at the advanced age of 110. Grandma was a great reader in her time, and had often seen Gen. Washington, Thomas Jefferson and other statesmen of her youthful days. Her best recollections, however, as to public men seems to have centered on Andrew Jackson, with whom, it is said, she once danced in her younger days. She was cheery, good-natured and affable, a simple, unostentatious Christian, and greatly beloved by all who knew her.

There has been some doubt as to the authenticity of her birth-date, and Mrs. Reynolds wrote relatives of the Ramsey family at Warm Springs, Mo., who quoted from the family Bible, sustaining Grandma Wood's great age.

The Late "Grandma Wood," Aged 120

hereafter minted or coined, shall bear the inscription "In God We Trust." On the same date, Representative Sheppard of Texas introduced a measure very similar in its wording, but stipulating that "On all forms of moneys, both metallic and paper," hereafter issued, the motto "In God We Trust" shall be inscribed.

On December 21, Representative Moore of Pennsylvania introduced the bill in the interest of which he later saw the President and secured the assurances of which mention is made above. This measure provides that the motto "In God We Trust" heretofore inscribed "on certain gold and silver coins of the United States of America, be continued to be inscribed upon all such said coins of all said former designs and denominations, as heretofore prior to this date." Furthermore it is stipulated "that all designs for coinage of either gold or silver coins of the United States, as issued in the year nineteen hundred and seven, be, and are hereby ordered to be placed in disuse, and that all designs, dies, plates or other mechanical appliances for the making of said new coinage be, and the same are hereby directed to be either destroyed or placed in a condition to make them unfit for future use for such purpose."

It will be seen that whereas the first two bills merely contemplate the introduction of the words, "In God We Trust," in the designs of our money already in use, the bill introduced by Representative Moore contemplates the retirement in their entirety of the new designs, which have been severely criticized as inartistic, aside from the objection made to them because of the omission of the time-honored motto.

Representative Sheppard of Texas, who introduced one of the bills to restore the motto, is only thirty-three years of age, yet this is his fourth term in Congress. He was elected to the Fifty-seventh Congress to fill out the unexpired term of his father, deceased. Representative Ollie

M. James of Kentucky is four years older than his colleague from the Lone Star State, and is serving his third term in Congress. He was one of the attorneys for Governor Goebel in his celebrated contest for the governorship of Kentucky. Representative J. Hampton Moore, author of the third bill to restore the motto to our coins, is the representative of one of the Philadelphia districts in the Lower House of Congress. He has been in public life for some years, having been city treasurer of Philadelphia at one time, and was appointed by President Roosevelt First Chief of the United States Bureau of Manufactures, an important branch of the Department of Commerce and Labor, organized a few years ago. Great numbers of letters of protest received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from every part of the country, have been forwarded to the Congressmen in charge of the bills for restoring the motto. These have been used in the campaign, and many of them have been published in The Congressional Record.

A Tribute from Canada

Dear Dr. Klopsch: A word of testimony about your 1908 premiums. We have been taking THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years, and have always appreciated the valuable premium offers you have so generously made from year to year; but this year, the value of the premium Red Letter, India-paper Bible which you offer, and a copy of which I have received, is so far ahead of anything yet received, in real value and merit, that it is a matter of surprise to me how you can afford to give it at the low price named, especially to your Canadian subscribers, who must appreciate the liberality of the publisher in maintaining the old price in face of the recent increase in postal rates. I also wish to thank you for the very handsome Calendar, which is very much admired in my home.

OUR PLANET'S DESTINY*

IS it possible to determine how long a time before life will become extinct on our planet? Doubtless an approximation may be made by carefully estimating the trend of all the forces. The problem involves so many factors that it would be difficult. Some mathematicians have attempted it. But much speculation must necessarily enter into any computation. Scientifically considered, the event is not remote. But reckoned by our years, they will be many.

And then? It is a fact long since determined that the planets are moving toward the Sun. Our year is steadily shortening. If you tie a ball at the end of a string and whirl it about your hand, allowing the string to wind around your finger at each revolution, you will readily see that the ball will make each revolution in less time than the preceding one. The reason of this is, you are shortening the distance over which the ball flies. So the orbit of our Earth is shortening year by year. This is seen only when we take into account any considerable period of time. And as the orbit of our Earth shortens, so must the orbits of the other planets to maintain their relative balance. The condensation of the Sun, too, would render him opaque. He would then lose every characteristic of a Sun. The Solar System must then be made over. "A new heaven and a new earth" must appear.

The scientific and logical result can be easily seen. The dead planets, with their attending satellites, will be drawn into the sun. Mercury will first plunge into that fiery abyss. Venus will soon follow. The perfect balance of the Solar System will be disturbed. Planet after planet will be hurled to its fiery burial. The tremendous concussions resulting, together with the introduction of so much combustible matter into the Sun, will so increase the heat that this matter will be again made gaseous, and again diffused as a nebulous cloud throughout the present Solar space. Out of this nebulous cloud other worlds will be formed, as the existing worlds were made. It is doubtless true that the matter of our present planets has entered into the composition of untold millions of worlds, before the present existing ones were made; and that it will enter into millions more before the Divine purposes shall be complete.

As has been said, suns and worlds, like men, are born. They grow, mature, decline and die. Nothing can be destroyed. Matter only changes form. Each particle enters into different relations with other particles. Decay and death are everywhere. Dissolution comes with time. All forms are evanescent. Matter takes new shapes with new combinations. It is only change. Worlds die and dissolve. From their gaseous mass new worlds are made. The forces and processes repeat themselves. That is all. And generations of systems come and go. And so they will come and go forever.

Magnificent as these occurrences will be, we shall survive them. And when the time shall come, as come it surely will, when "the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll"; when "the elements shall melt with a fervent heat"; and when "the Earth, and all that is therein, shall be burned up," we will stand in "that house of many mansions," and raising our voices in grateful praise, will thank God that he made us men.

Japan Checks Emigration

AN official order was issued by the Japanese government during the last week of January to the emigration companies of Japan that may do much toward removing the sources of friction between the Japanese and the United States and Canada.

The order absolutely prohibits Japanese going to the Hawaiian Islands, unless those who wish to go have relatives already living there. The emigration companies are, of course, greatly displeased, and have made violent attacks on the policy of their foreign office. Viscount Hayashi is unmoved by their protests evidently, and has said that as the Japanese government had given its promise it would not be moved by mere political pressure.

The government, it is reported, intends soon to restrict the emigration of laborers to America and Canada, except under conditions satisfactory to the governments of the two countries. No laborers will be allowed to go to Mexico.

By MARY McCREA CULTER

"THAT'S it, exactly," said Glenn.
"Honestly, Miss Tilly, dropping all foolishness, I did hate to treat the girl so, but what else could I do? The case was desperate, and I could think of no other way to break the spell she had over him. You know she can be simply adorable—when she chooses to be—and the poor fellow has no earthly chance to save himself from the thief who is bent on robbing him of his heart and power, if every one continues to pass by on the other side.
I've made my confession, and I'm as penitent as it is possible to be under the circumstances."

Miss Tilly did not try to answer the young man, for the case was quite as puzzling to her as it had been to him.

"We must see that a crowd of us go along home as they do," he said, rising to leave her, and Miss Tilly nodded assent.

Mr. Allan had been deeply disturbed by the events of the evening. The memory of the pleasant intercourse at supper-time, and the feelings of admiration which Hollis had aroused then, had been almost obliterated by the unpleasant conversation with Glenn, and by her conduct during the song rehearsal after prayer-meeting. She had been so sure of her triumph near at hand, that her defeat was bitter and overwhelming, and drove her almost to desperation. Mr.
Allan and Miss Walker both tried to persuade her to join with the other young people in their practising of the new music; but she haughtily refused.

It was not long before Mr. Allan sought her side and said: "As you do not care to sing, shall we go home now?"
"Suit your own pleasure," the girl replied coldly.

Miss Walker had discreetly remained within hearing distance, though seemingly attentive only to the music. Now she laid down her singing-book, and went out into the vestibule. At the door she hesitated, as if unwilling to walk alone through the darkness; and as Mr. Allan came out with Hollis, he noted her apparent fear.

"We are going your way, Miss Walker," he said with true courtesy.
"Will you walk with us?"

"Indeed I will," she replied. "It is pretty dark to-night, and although I am not really afraid to go alone, still it is more heartsome to have company."

Glenn, watching from his post beside the organ, chuckled with satisfaction.

"Miss Tilly's a whole army in herself—from sergeant to commander-in-chief.
We have met the enemy and defeated her so far."

CHAPTER XVI

"MARK THEM WHO CAUSE DIVISION"

AFTER bidding Hollis a brief goodnight, Mr. Allan went to his room. He sat down in a chair, placed his elbows on his desk and dropped his head in his hands. He was unutterably weary and depressed.
His heart and his thoughts were with the large choir of young people at the church where he longed to be, and where but for Hollis' perversity he would have been. For a moment he was tempted to go back. Then he thought:
"No, now that I have come away, it is better that I should stay here. To return would only increase Hollis' resentment, and it would certainly arouse comments among the young people, who do not seem to be very well-disposed toward the girl. It is strange how strong a factor personal jealousy can become, and how it will cause young people to reject the assistance of those who are capable of helping them so much. I do not understand it. Glenn Fraser appears to have a terribly provocative influence upon her, and he uses it without scruple and without mercy. I shall have to speak to him about it. But for his interference to-night, things would have been far different, for Hollis was never sweeter than when we started for prayer-meeting."

The puzzled young minister sat still grappling with the problem, so purblind can beauty and charm of person make even a man who is a guide to others.
He recalled some of the remarks that had infuriated Hollis. "I wonder," he muttered, "how much of what Glenn said was true, and how much was said merely for perverseness' sake, and to arouse Hollis' temper. Really, I was surprised to see that she has such a temper, for she never exhibits it around home. I wonder what has caused the bad feeling that evidently exists between her and the majority of the other young people. Since I stop to think of it, very few of them ever come here to see her, and none of the young men pay her any attention—indeed, their manner toward her is decidedly disrespectful. Yet none of them have ever said a word to me against her, which is very strange. Hollis has explained many things by revealing the troubles and unpleasant conditions among the people of the church, and between them and herself. She has told me—" his reverie came to a sudden halt as a new and very unpleasant idea struck him.

He pushed back his chair, and paced the floor restlessly and excitedly, while his mind crept slowly back over the events of the last few weeks. He remembered his conversation with Miss Walker, and her closing advice: "Watch the influences which are brought to bear upon you, and carefully consider whether they tend toward good or toward evil.
You will soon discover where the sources of your troubles lie; then you can save yourself."

Impelled by these words, and by the new idea that had come to him, he went back to the time of his arrival in Hawthorne, and carefully considered the influences that had worked upon him.
The longer he pondered, the more dismayed he became, as proof after proof came to him of the wrong impressions which had been made upon him by the girl whom he realized he had come very near to loving. He recalled the first ride they had taken together, and the prejudices against the Conovers, the Alisons and the Lawrences, which she had instilled into his mind, and which he had found to be totally undeserved.

He remembered the unkind, bitter, spiteful things which she had said about Kathleen Lawrence, and the silent dignity and sweetness with which Kathleen had lived down these accusations, and had refused to say one word against any one. All that Hollis had said, decrying the musical ability of others, and praising her own, also came back to him so clearly that he was surprised by his own obtuseness at the time such things were spoken.

Connecting Glenn's laughing revelations of their many "battles," with her two exhibitions of violent temper, he was forced to believe that her "even, unruffled disposition" was a delusion of his own mind, and that such exhibitions must often have been witnessed by the young people of Hawthorne.

Her revelations, coupled with Glenn's, and her frequent declarations that she "could not and would not" work under the lead of others, told him unmistakably where the source of the choir troubles lay.

The harmony, the progress and the interest taken in church work by the people during the weeks of the absence of the Hayward family, finally forced him to believe that the Haywards and no others were the disturbing factors of the Hawthorne church peace.

The longer he studied the matter, the more he became convinced that his new theory was right; the more certain he was that Hollis was the main source of the church troubles, and the more disgusted he became over the deceit of which he had been the dupe. He remembered, with a shiver, the feeling of admiration which had filled his mind when he sat at the supper-table only a few hours ago with her, and realized that, but for Glenn's interference, he would have spoken words to her which would have tied him to her for life, and have effectually ruined his career as a minister of the Gospel of truth and peace.

Verily, with her own hand she had erased the good impressions she had made upon his mind, destroyed the budding love in his heart, and dug the grave of her own ambitions.

A tap on the window interrupted his reverie, and a moment later Charlie Lester stepped into the room.

"We saw your light burning, so I made bold to stop and bring you your book which you forgot, and to give you a list of the pieces we practised."

"Good!" exclaimed Mr. Allan, his spirits rising at sight of the face of this congenial friend. "Did you have a good practice?"

"Fine. Sadie Glendenning and the Barker young folks are a grand addition to our choir. We were sorry to miss you to-night, but I do not know but I am glad, after all, that you were away, for we will give you a pleasant surprise with our music next Sunday. Well, I must go. I would like to stop for a good chat, but the girls are waiting, and it will be late enough before I get back to town."

Mr. Allan walked with him to the buggy, where the two Lawrence girls sat waiting. In the gay conversation that followed, all traces of his depression vanished, and hope, and courage, and peace came back to his heart. Ere they drove away, he took occasion to say to Kathleen: "I have made some discoveries in regard to church work, which I think will interest you. May I come over to-morrow afternoon?"

"I have no engagements," Kathleen answered, "and I will be glad to learn of any good things you contemplate. I shall look for you at three o'clock."

The minister went back to his room with light heart and brisk step, humming a tune as he went.

From her window in the upper story, at which she had strained her eyes and ears to obtain a knowledge of the conversation at the buggy, Hollis watched him come up the walk and caught the happy tone in his voice—so different from the inflection with which he had bade her good-night—and her heart sank.

"I wish I could get even with Glenn Fraser and those Lawrence girls. If only I had delayed starting to prayer-meeting five minutes longer to-night, Glenn would have been safely past our gate, and there would have been no trouble. I am sure everything would have been settled between Edgar and me, for I saw it in his eyes. Now, it will take weeks, maybe, to get him back to the same place, for that clique have such a tremendous influence over him, and never fail to turn him against me. Oh, dear!
I wish I could lock him up here until it was too late for any one to interfere between us."

Hollis was very sweet and alluring the next morning, and looked at Mr. Allan with eyes that besought forgetfulness of all unpleasant things; but the grave courtesy with which he met all her advances, and the changed expression in his eyes, chilled her hopes, and told her unmistakably that she had lost her hold upon his heart. When she saw him drive away down the river road that afternoon, she knew where he was going, and felt that all the advantage had been shifted to the side of the girl whom she chose to consider as her rival.

"I have found my chief 'eraser,'" the minister said to Kathleen when they were seated together in the pleasant quiet of the Lawrence parlor. "I am sure that

I am right, and I am sure, also, that you know, and have known all the time, just where the source of my trouble lies. Since this is the case, I have come to you for advice, for I have proved that my own judgment is so faulty that I feel afraid to advance without counsel, when the interests of the church are at stake.

"By her own revelations, Miss Hollis has become her own eraser, and has destroyed what I now see was her baleful influence over me. Please tell me whether I am right in thinking that this influence is what has stood between the other young people and me. Is this why my every project, previous to her absence, was met with suspicion by every one? Surely I have a right to know this much," he ended in pleading tones.

Kathleen hesitated over her answer. It seemed treasonable to the absent to admit what she knew was true, yet she was forced to believe that the time had come when silence would be detrimental even to the best interests of Hollis. So she answered:

"Since Hollis herself has worked out the problem for you, it is only fair that I should admit that your answer is correct. There has been no feeling against you personally in the church. The only fear has been that your plans and efforts were inspired and guided by those whose leadership has always been productive of trouble, whether used for or against the minister in charge. Now that you know, I am sure you will have no more trouble. The church has rallied beautifully to your standard in the last few weeks, when they knew that your plans were your own. Many who have been upon the opposing side for years, have come into harmony with the majority, and are willing to aid in every way. The church is ready for a genuine, old-fashioned revival. Are you ready to help us to it?"

The searching question went deep into the heart of the young man. He was stirred with a profound sense of the duties, the opportunities, the possibilities that lay before him, and the eyes which at length he raised to meet her clear gaze were filled with tears as he answered solemnly:

"God helping me, I am."

To be concluded

Revival Services in Brooklyn

SELDOM have such scenes been witnessed in the famous Hanson Place Methodist Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, as during the past few weeks. The church has been the scene of many such movements in past years, but not often has it been so deeply stirred. Not only from the immediate neighborhood of the church, but from other districts, crowds have poured in, filling floor and galleries with attentive hearers. Even the vestibules have been thronged after every available sitting and standing place in the spacious edifice has been occupied. Evangelist Davis has preached in his usual vigorous, original style, and singer Mills and his choir have rendered the revival hymns with spirit and enthusiasm. The after meetings have been remarkable for their earnestness and power, and there have been striking evidences in the inquiry room of the Holy Spirit's presence and power. No attempt has yet been made to count the converts, but judging by the promptness with which an invitation to them to occupy the platform was accepted by three hundred men on a recent evening, it would appear that the total number must be large. It is stated that Simpson M. E. Church and other churches of the Methodist and other denominations, are sharing with the Hanson Place Church in the blessing.

the absolute purity of

GRAPE-NUTS

Every analysis undertaken shows this food to be made strictly of Wheat and Barley, treated by our processes to partially transform the starch parts into a form of Sugar, and therefore much easier to digest.

Our claim that it is a "Food for Brain and Nerve Centres" is based upon the fact that certain parts of wheat and Barley (which we use) contain Nature's brain and nerve-building ingredients, viz., Phosphate of Potash, and the way we prepare the food makes it easy to digest and assimilate.

Dr. Geo. W. Carey in his book on "The Biochemic System of Medicine" says:

"When the medical profession fully understands the nature and range of the phosphate of potassium, insane asylums will no longer be needed.

"The gray matter of the brain is controlled entirely by the inorganic cell-salt, potassium phosphate.

"This salt unites with albumen, and by the addition of oxygen creates nerve-fluid, or the gray matter of the brain.

"Of course, there is a trace of other salts and the organic matter in nervefluid, but potassium phosphate is the chief factor, and has the power within itself to attract, by its own law of affinity, all things needed to manufacture the elixir of life. Therefore, when nervous symptoms arise, due to the fact that the nerve-fluid has been exhausted from any cause, the phosphate of potassium is the only true remedy, because nothing else can possibly supply the deficiency.

"The ills arising from too rapidly consuming the gray matter of the brain cannot be overestimated.

"Phosphate of Potash is, to my mind, the most wonderful curative agent ever discovered by man, and the blessings it has already conferred on the race are many. But 'what shall the harvest be' when physicians everywhere fully understand the part this wonderful salt plays in the processes of life? It will do as much as can be done through physiology to make a heaven on earth.

"Let the overworked business man take it and go home good-tempered. Let the weary wife, nerves unstrung from attending to sick children or entertaining company, take it and note how quickly the equilibrium will be restored and calm and reason assert her throne. No 'proving's' are required here. We find this potassium salt largely predominates in nerve-fluid, and that a deficiency produces well-defined symptoms. The beginning and end of the matter is to supply the lacking principle, and in molecular form, exactly as nature furnishes it in vegetables, fruits and grain. To supply deficiencies—this is the only law of cure."

BRAIN POWER

Increased by Proper Feeding.

A lady writer who not only has done good literary work, but reared a family, found in Grape-Nuts the ideal food for brain work and to develop healthy children. She writes:

"I am an enthusiastic proclaimer of Grape-Nuts as a regular diet. I formerly had no appetite in the morning and for 8 years while nursing my four children, had insufficient nourishment for them.

"Unable to eat breakfast I felt faint later, and would go to the pantry and eat cold chops, sausage, cookies, doughnuts or anything I happened to find. Being a writer, at times my head felt heavy and my brain asleep.

"When I read of Grape-Nuts I began eating it every morning, also gave it to the children, including my 10 months old baby, who soon grew as fat as a little pig, good natured and contented.

"I wrote evenings and feeling the need of sustained brain power, began eating a small saucer of Grape-Nuts with milk, instead of my usual indigestible hot pudding, pie, or cake for dessert at night.

"I grew plump, nerves strong, and when I wrote my brain was active and clear; indeed, the dull head pain never returned."

Please observe that Phosphate of Potash is not properly of the drug-shop variety but is best prepared by "Old Mother Nature" and stored in the grains ready for use by mankind. Those who have been helped to better health by the use of Grape-Nuts are legion.

WISE CLERK

Quits Sandwiches and Coffee for Lunch

The noon-day lunch for the Department clerks at Washington, is often a most serious question.

"For fifteen years," writes one of these clerks, "I have been working in one of the Gov't Departments. About two years ago I found myself every afternoon, with a very tired feeling in my head, trying to get the days work off my desk.

"I had heard of Grape-Nuts as a food for brain and nerve centres, so I began to eat it instead of my usual heavy breakfast, then for my lunch instead of sandwiches and coffee.

"In a very short time the tired feeling in the head left me, and ever since then the afternoon's work has been done with as much ease and pleasure as the morning's work.

"Grape-Nuts for two meals a day has worked, in my case, just as advertised, producing that reserve force and supply of energy that does not permit one to tire easily—so essential to the successful prosecution of one's life work." "There's a reason."

GOT MAD

When Told That Coffee Hurt Him.

One of the evidences that coffee is injurious to the nervous system, is the fact that many persons who are addicted to its use, grow wrathful when the suggestion is made that coffee causes them to "flare up" so easily.

A doctor writes:—"Coffee three times a day—I thought I could not get along without it. I was never well, prone to get excited and often trembled, but any suggestion that coffee was not good for me made me furious.

"I noticed the tendency to become excited was growing on me. My hands and feet were cold, fingers looked shriveled, liver inactive, constipated, coated tongue, bad breath and general lower vitality. (A perfect picture of caffeine poisoning.)

A friend strongly advised me to give up coffee and use Postum, so I tried the change a few weeks and found a marked improvement in temper, nerves, and general condition. I felt so firm that I thought I could go back to coffee. Three times I tried it but always had to quit coffee and return to Postum.

"Being a physician with a large practice and plenty of experience, it was hard for me to believe that coffee could have such a profound effect on my system. Perhaps my fondness for the beverage made me loath to admit its ill effects.

"For several years now I have ordered hundreds of patients to quit coffee and have prescribed Postum instead with good results to the patients and more prompt response to my medicines."

He Served His Country Well

The Late Gen. C. H. Howard's Career as Soldier, Philanthropist, and Editor

GENERAL CHARLES H. HOWARD died at his home in Glencoe, a suburb of Chicago, January 27, of pneumonia, after a brief illness. He was distinguished as soldier, editor, philanthropist and Christian man of business. He was a brother of Major-General O. O. Howard, United States Army. He was born in Leeds, Me., August 28, 1838, and educated at Kent's Hill and Yarmouth Academies and Bowdoin College, from which he was graduated in 1859. He enlisted in the Third Maine Infantry in 1861, and afterward was assigned to the staff of his brother, Major-General O. O. Howard, as aide-de-camp, serving with him in the battles of Bull Run, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Look-out Mountain, and Fair Oaks, where he was wounded. He was senior aide on the commander's staff in the famous "march to the sea." For his brilliant services he was breveted brigadier-general on his retirement from active service. He was made a member of the Freedmen's Bureau during the reconstruction period. General Howard married Miss Mary Catherine Foster, daughter of John B. Foster, of Bangor, Me., in 1867, and moved in 1869 to Chicago, where he became secretary of the American Missionary Association. He was appointed Government Inspector of Indian Agencies of the Interior Department by President Garfield, and was editor of The Advance. In 1885 he became editor of Farm, Field and Fireside. Three years ago he retired from business.

He is survived by seven children: Otis McGregor Howard, of Chicago, who represents the Western interests of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; Dr. B. F. Howard, superintendent of the Massachusetts State Insane Asylum; Rev. L. R. Howard, of Plainfield, N. J.; Prof. Arthur D. Howard, of Westminster College; Donald C. Howard, of Pierre, S. D.; and Misses Katherine and Nina F. Howard, residing at the family home in Glencoe.

Personally, General Howard was one of the most lovable of men. He was a picturesque figure in the journalistic field. His grave courtesy, engaging voice and soldierly bearing, remind one of the courtly old cavaliers of other days. To these he added a vigorous mind and keen ambitions, that were thoroughly American. One of his biographers writes: "Fortunate is he who can induce him to open the store of reminiscence." He was born of good New England parentage and of Scotch-Irish descent. His boyhood and youth were spent in the frugal, God-serving, manhood-developing atmosphere of that locality and time.

He was not ashamed to work his way at school and college, teaching in his vacations. Enlisting as a soldier, his education gave him immediate preferment, and within a year he received his commission. He was the close companion and confidant of his brother, General O. O. Howard, in almost every battle of the war. And it is not too much to say that his brother relied very strongly on his quickness and keenness of perception and his absolute courage and devotion, both in planning and executing many of his great campaigns. During the reconstruction period, while he was on the Freedmen's Bureau, though often threatened with death, he stood by his post, and tried in his courteous, gentle, honorable way, to protect the negroes and refugees.

As Field Secretary of the American Missionary Association, he founded and aided thousands of schools for colored people in the South, for the Chinese on the Pacific Coast, and for the Indians. His interest in the "oppressed races" has been the keynote of his life.

He rendered valuable service as Inspector of Indian Agencies, to which post he was appointed by President Garfield. On one occasion, his direct appeal to Washington saved the Blackfeet Indian tribe from starvation. On all matters connected with Indian affairs, he was a recognized authority, and he was much sought after for such gatherings at the Mohonk Conference.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Reader, Iowa. "For several years a dark cloud of trouble hung over my own home. I prayed that it might be removed. I thank God my prayer has been answered."

Mrs. E. H. "I want to acknowledge constant answers to prayer in most distressing times. I have seen any one live without God in this hard, care-ridden world."

M. L., Washington. "I was in great trouble and promised the Lord if he would help me, I would acknowledge it to the world. He heard my prayers and answered them."

A Friend, New York City. "I wish to testify to the benefit received from the Answered Prayers column. The Lord has answered many prayers for me, and I shall keep on praying."

J. M. R., Canada. "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness to me in answering prayer. I have received many answers and have learned to trust and obey him, knowing that he rules over all."

Reader, Ohio. "When greatly troubled, I cried to the Lord for help in my difficulty. He heard and helped. We, the children of a King, have a never-failing source of comfort, strength, and power."

Believer, Spokane, Wash. "I wish to add my testimony. The Lord graciously answered my prayer, when I was in distress and knew not where to turn. May this encourage some other distressed one."

L. D., Iowa. "I promised the Almighty God if he would answer my prayer, I would tell it to the world through your Answered Prayers column. He has answered my prayers many times. Never despair or lose hope until you have asked the Lord to help you."

Confidence, New York City. "I love the Lord, because he hath heard my voice, and my supplications." In a remarkable way, God has recently answered the united prayers of myself and family, and relieved us of a great anxiety. I desire to acknowledge his goodness."

Monarchs in Business

Monarch and man of business is a more frequent combination than many persons imagine. Emperor William owns a well-equipped pottery, which brings him $50,000 a year. The King of Wurtemberg is proprietor of two large hotels, which pay handsome profits. The King of Saxony owns a porcelain factory at Meissen. The Regent of Lippe-Detmold runs a large model farm, and sells butter, milk and eggs. The King of Serbia owns a barber shop and an apothecary shop, and is an agent for motor cars.

Argentina Welcomes the Flotilla

BUENOS AYRES, Argentina, has been giving an enthusiastic welcome to the officers and men of the American destroyer flotilla that is bound to the Pacific with the battleship fleet. The destroyers are light craft and have kept closer to the coast than the main battleship squadron, and consequently the men are enabled to see much more of the South American countries.

The officers were taken automobile riding about the city under the guidance of officers of the Argentine torpedo boats. Everywhere the people on the streets greeted them enthusiastically, and it was very evident that the visit was greatly appreciated. There was an elaborate luncheon at the end of the ride at the Pavilion Las Rosas. That same evening the officers had a dinner given in their honor by the Minister of Marine, Vice-Admiral Betbeder.

The Argentine sailors, not to be outdone in hospitality by their superiors, gave a dinner to the American bluejackets at the marine barracks; this, while not such an elaborate affair as that enjoyed by the officers was as greatly appreciated, and music and fun lasted until a late hour.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs, Senor Zeballos, sent a very friendly dispatch to Secretary of State Root in regard to the fleet's visit. Among other things he said, "I have had the honor to receive the officers of the American destroyers in my office. Their visit was hailed with lively fellow feeling by the people and authorities and revives the most pleasant memories of Mr. Root's voyage to South America. May fair winds and smooth seas carry the Pacific squadron safely to the shores of the farther land." The Secretary of State at once cabled a long and cordial reply. President Roosevelt cabled to President Alcora, of Argentina, his thanks for the message of good will he had received from him, and his thanks for the many courtesies extended to the men of the destroyer flotilla. "With nations, as with individuals," said President Roosevelt, "such kindly amenities are very potent in strengthening the bonds of friendship, and all the people of the United States greatly desire this as between them and the people of Argentina."

The larger fleet of sixteen battleships has reported by wireless that it is making excellent progress. The dispatch was sent by Admiral Evans to the officers of the Argentine fleet, who passed it on to Washington. The important part for many anxious mothers and wives is contained in the words, "All well."

How the Blind Babies' Home Was Helped

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Your letter enclosing the check for $1,587.52, representing contributions by your readers for the Sunshine Home for Blind Babies, is just received. This is the largest check that ever came into the office. About all I can do now is to sit and look at it, read it over and over, to see if I have not made a mistake.

How little we realized the generosity of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD! It is needless to say that the troubles at the Blind Babies' Home have all vanished. The first mortgage of $5,000 is now canceled, with a goodly sum to begin the second one. Our struggles have been many and hard to hold this Home until the State and city could give us the proper support.

Dear Dr. Klopsch, were I not supposed to be a woman of dignity and self-control, I would sit down and have a good cry. The relief to me personally furnished by this check, is more than I can explain. As treasurer of this Sunshine Home for Blind Babies, it is but natural that the responsibility of raising the money to meet the expenses fell principally upon me, although, without the other officers and friends, I could not have succeeded; at the same time, I have realized for some months that if my health should break down, I was leaving no one just prepared to take up the cares and keep the Home open. Were it closed, it would mean many of these helpless blind little ones going back to the department of feeble-minded, which would mean death to them in a very short time.

The contribution has come just in time for me to make a note of it in the February Bulletin. Never have I dictated an item of news with greater satisfaction and joy. I am going to call a meeting of the board and hold a jubilee over this check, the gift of your readers. Please believe me,

Yours gratefully in sunshine or shade,
MRS. CYNTHIA WESTOVER ALDEN.
New York City.

A Roof of All-round Protection

REX

The above photograph shows the plant of the New Jersey Rubber Co., of Lambertville, New Jersey, which is permanently roofed with

REX FLINT-KOTE ROOFING

Study this picture carefully and you will see that the roofing on these buildings is depended upon to give several distinct sorts of protection; first there is the protection against rain and snow required of every roof; then there is the protection from flying sparks from the locomotives which pass alongside the buildings; then again there is the protection from the corroding influences of the fumes arising from the rubber manufacturing processes.

And so you see a practical example of the all-round protection given by REX Flintkote ROOFING. Other roofings may offer one or another sort of protection, but REX is the complete roofing—we can prove it.

Write for Book and Samples of REX Roofing

The book will tell you all about Rex Flintkote Roofing and give photographs of other buildings on which it is used, with letters of recommendation from users. The samples will show you what Rex Flintkote Roofing really is and enable you to test its properties.

Healing Waters

By Mrs. M. BAXTER

As a Jew, Jesus was under the law, and all through his life he punctually performed all his Father's commandments in the law. "Three times in a year shall all thy males appear before the Lord thy God in the place which he shall choose; in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles" (Deut. 16: 16). Son of God though he was, Jesus obeyed the law, and thus showed us how obedience, equally with faith, is part of the will of God. While he was at Jerusalem on this occasion we find him attracted by the need of poor sick people to the pool of Bethesda.

The Hebrew word "Bethesda" signifies "house of mercy," and Jesus' presence there would have made it a house of mercy for each one, had they but recognized him as the Messiah, "the Lord that healeth thee" (Exod. 15: 26). They were within a few yards of the great Fountain of healing virtue, but they knew it not. The need was there and the remedy was there, but they were blind to it; they looked another way. Bethesda consisted of a pool, surrounded by five porches. "In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water."

Oh, how many there are on every hand in sore need, in spirit, soul or body, who are waiting for something which the eye can see or which the ear can hear, or which can be made real to them by the evidence of their senses! Some are waiting for the help of some human being; many sick people are waiting for a doctor of whose skill they have heard, or watching the success of some new remedy which they have applied; or it may be they are waiting for an opportunity to try the benefit of another climate, or they are waiting until some circumstance may be more favorable for recovery from their sickness.

How many there are who are oppressed by temporal needs, and have come into great business difficulties, who are waiting until trade revives or until some one shall lend them a large sum of money—waiting for anything and everything except for God! "Blessed are all they that wait for Him" (Isa. 30: 18). How many there are in spiritual need who are waiting until they can attend some meeting where others have found blessing; or some conference of Christians which is at hand; or until they can have a talk with somebody who is more deeply instructed than they are in the things of God; who are waiting, in some way, for "the moving of the water."

For this uncertain help the many sick ones were waiting, but only the first to step down could receive it. The most able, the least infirm, those who had sight to guide them and limbs to carry them, stood the best chance; the others must wait, and many of them waited long enough. "A certain man was there, who had an infirmity thirty and eight years." As far as we can gather, he had lived for thirty-eight years with the fond expectation of being some day or the other the first to be put into the pool. Seeing this man lie, and knowing that he had been a long time in that case, Jesus saith unto him, "Wilt thou be made whole?" The usual answer to this question is: "Of course I will! There is nothing I desire so much as to be healed." And yet, after all, it comes to a point of will.

Man is always trying to persuade himself and others that he is ready for every blessing, but that he has great difficulty in obtaining blessings from God. He will say: "I have prayed and prayed for years, and yet have received no answer from God. I have tried and struggled; I have considered the matter; I have examined my faith and I have exercised all the faith I could, and yet the answer to my prayers is not come." The Lord says: "I am willing and ye are not." He says: "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

Personal Paragraph to All Readers

EVERY lady reader of this paper ought to be interested in the offer made on this page. Here is a watch offered just for an effort. Here is a genuine gold-plated watch absolutely given away just for trying for a premium. Look at the picture of the watch and ask yourself how can any lady "pass up" this offer when the watch is given just for making an honest effort. Besides the Watch, there is a Set of Dishes. These Dishes are not exactly free like the Watch. It is a premium that you must earn with only a slight effort. You can earn it by a few hours' work. I know you can easily earn these Dishes, and, anyway, you get the beautiful Gold-plated Watch free. Send your name and address to-day, either on the Coupon or send your name and address to-day in a letter; but write to-day to Mr. Balch.

LADIES!

Ladies, just write to-day for this elegant Gold-plated Watch, a watch that is stem-wind and stem-set, and guaranteed to keep perfect time. You can have this Watch just for your effort and promptness in fulfilling the simple conditions of the offer below.

Remember, this beautiful Watch IS given away—it is sent you free, prepaid, just for your promptness and your effort in our behalf. Our object in giving you the Watch is because we want to introduce our firm in your locality. But even if you do not earn the Dishes, you can get the Watch anyway. So send your name and address to-day. That is all we ask.

This Beautiful Watch is Free!

Yes, we mean free—actually free if you send your name and address at once and fulfil these simple conditions of our great offer. Just send your name and address and tell us you want the watch.

We will guarantee this Watch to be Gold-plated and genuine throughout. We guarantee it to you to be a good time-keeper, more substantial, more durable than many watches sold at high prices. It is only by special arrangement with the manufacturers, who want a few of these great Watches introduced at once, that we are enabled to give this splendid Gold-plated Watch away with our magnificent and superb Set of Dishes.

AN HONEST DINNER SET OFFER

A Real, high-grade, genuine Blue Willow Dinner Set. Not given away, but easily earned. When we say easily earned, we mean easily earned. We do not intend to give you this genuine Blue Willow Dinner Set for nothing. We want some of your time and some of your recommendation and some work from you. We do not want any canvassing nor peddling, but we want your help. We want just five hours' worth of your time, and you can give us your time in the evening or in any of your spare hours. If you haven't the time yourself, you can have your children help you. In fact your children can do all the work if you will only show them how. Then this grand, glorious genuine Blue Willow Dinner Set will be yours. It will be sent you absolutely free of charge to you, and you pay absolutely nothing for it. Not one penny of your money will we accept.

We cannot describe the beauty of this genuine Blue Willow Dinner Set, with its handsome decorations—so handsome and aristocratic that they fill every woman with rapture. We know that a great many dinner sets have been sold which are not up to expectations, and when we tell you that this is genuine Blue Willow China, it ought to be enough. It ought to convince you that we mean what we say, that our offer is an honest one, and that when you have done the work for us you will get this Dinner Set Free. This grand Dinner Set is really worth your while, a Dinner Set of which you and your family will be proud—for this is not a cheap premium, but just the kind of a Dinner Set that you would buy at the store for a high price.

There are sixty-one pieces in this beautiful set. We have smaller sets of this glorious Blue Willow Ware. We have twenty-four piece sets, and entrancing thirty and thirty-five piece sets. We also have sets of one hundred and seventy-six pieces if you want that many, and every piece is the rarest and best China we can give.

I know you want that kind of china on your table. I want you to have the very best china—the kind of china used in the home of rich people. I want you to have it and enjoy it, and I want you to picture to yourself how your table will look set with the beautiful genuine Blue Willow China. Look closely at this picture of the dishes. See the handsome and aristocratic decorations. A picture can hardly do justice to the set, but you can get a faint idea of the beauty of the dishes by looking at the picture.

See the rich, oriental effect—the beautiful Blue of this rare ware. Even though you become very rich and have the finest kind of house furnishings you will always be proud to entertain your friends with this Dinner Set, for everyone knows that when you have the genuine Blue Willow China, you have the Best that can be obtained any place.

Now do you want this Dinner Set?—this beautiful, genuine Blue Willow Dinner Set, just for a few of your spare hours? Would not your children, or your neighbors, or some of the members of your family be willing to help you on the little work we ask? Everybody is just crazy to get this great 25c offer. Get 14 friends to accept your offer, and both the Watch and Dinner Set are yours—FREE. Our offer is limited.

Just Your Name and Address

Just your name and address on this Coupon or on a postal card, or in a letter, will be enough. We will promptly send you the wonderful 25c offer plan, so that you can earn the beautiful, genuine Blue Willow Dinner Set. If you decide that you cannot do the work, there is no harm done—just return the material, and you will be under no obligations whatever. We do not ask you to sign any order or any contracts. Just your name and address, and we will send you everything prepaid, and it will cost you nothing. "Thinking about it" does not earn you any Blue Willow Dinner Set. Send your name and address to-day. Remember, the beautiful Gold-plated Watch free anyway, just for trying, as is fully explained in our circular. So write at once. Just your name and address, that is all. Simply write your name and address on this coupon.

Family Worship — Day by Day

Value of Family Prayer

"Family prayer is an institution of priceless value where it is kept up conscientiously, seriously, regularly, and where it is endorsed by domestic administration and personal example. Where it is a part of a steady and genuine life, and not performed perfunctorily, it is full of power. The memory of it goes through life, hallowing every thought of home, reminding the wanderer of the days of innocence and devotion, and alluring him again to Christ, who was so long enshrined in the family circle. May the truth and the teaching presented in this volume find living administration and enforcement in the homes of its readers."

THE PORTUGUESE ASSASSINATIONS

TWO continents were shocked by the news flashed from

Lisbon on February 1, that King Carlos and Crown Prince Luiz Filippe of Portugal, had been assassinated by agitators, whose object was apparently not only to overthrow the government, but to exterminate the reigning family of Braganza. The King, with Queen Amelie, the Crown Prince and Prince Manuel, the second son, was driving in an open carriage, slightly ahead of the other vehicles, when the attack occurred. They were returning from the royal estate of Villa Vicosa, the King's favorite residence, where they had been passing an agreeable holiday. All were in high spirits, notwithstanding the political troubles which beset the government, and the King and Queen thought little about danger. Indeed, so confident were they of safety, that the King had refused a military escort for the royal carriage, and only a handful of mounted police accompanied the party. As the vehicle proceeded, it passed through throngs of holiday sight-seers, which included members of the Court, Ministers, and ladies, as well as large numbers of the working classes, all ready to welcome the royal party on its return to the capital.

As the carriage turned into Rua do Arsenal (Arsenal Street), a group of men armed with carbines, who had been waiting at the Praca do Comercio, suddenly sprang forward. An eye-witness declares that one man, tall and bearded, and wearing a dark mantle, leaped upon the step of the King's carriage, and, leaning over, emptied the contents of his revolver in the King's neck and back. At the same instant there was a rattling of fire-arms, and a shower of bullets struck the carriage, penetrating the bodies of the King and the Crown Prince at short range. It was all done so swiftly that the police, seemingly stupefied, were unable to prevent the assassins, six in number, who ran up from behind to the side of the carriage. At the first shot, Queen Amelie, who seemed to divine the situation more quickly than those around her, uttered a scream, and flinging herself between the assassins and her two sons, tried in vain to screen their bodies with her own. She stood up in the carriage and struck frantically at the nearest of the assailants with a large bouquet of roses which she had been carrying in her lap, breaking the flowers, which were scattered along the drive. The King, wounded to death, had fallen

in her brave defense, when he, too, pitched forward, falling over the body of the King.

When the young Prince Manuel saw his father and Prince Luiz fall, he drew a revolver and discharged it point-blank at one of the assailants. At the same moment, the assassins' carbines cracked, and Manuel sank back in his seat with a wounded face and right arm. One of the footmen in the royal carriage was wounded, and a bullet grazed Queen Amelie's shoulder. It is said that while she had been trying to fight off the attack, one of the assassins aimed at her breast, but was sabred by the police and the shot went wide.

The regicides meant that both Manuel and the Queen should perish. One of them, standing in the shelter of a pillar, deliberately aimed at Amelie and the Prince, but was choked by a young officer named Valiente. He shot Valiente dead, and was himself sabred the next instant by one of the King's aides.

The street was now like a section of pandemonium. The assassins, after discharging their weapons, had fled into the crowds, which became panic-stricken. Then the police guard charged hotly after the fugitives and riddled three of them with bullets. Many of the people joined in the pursuit, and soon the survivors of the band of assassins were made prisoners. The royal victims were hurried to the Maritime Hospital, where both the King and the Prince expired soon after their arrival. Prince Manuel's wound was found to be slight and the Queen was practically unharmed. The King and Prince Luiz had each sustained three wounds and these were apparently delivered at such short range as to assure deadly results. The bodies were conveyed to the Necessidades Palace and placed on biers, while troops guarded the palace and a squadron of cavalry surrounded the house. Meanwhile the Council of State issued a proclamation declaring Prince Manuel King of Portugal, in succession, under the title of Manuel II.

The night which followed will never be forgotten in Lisbon. Through the long hours Queen Amelie sat with her dead in the palace, prostrated with grief. She sat between the two biers, her right hand touching the face of her husband, while her left rested lovingly

The Backslider

TEXT — John 5: 14 — "Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee"

CALVINISTS and Arminians have battled for generations over the question whether it is possible for a man, who has once been converted, to fall into sin and be finally lost. The question is no nearer a settlement than it was a hundred years ago, but I think there is one aspect of it in which both would agree. Unhappily, there is no room for dispute about the facts. The Methodist points, in proof of his contention, to men who are sunk in vice and degradation, who were once believed to be true Christians. The Presbyterian sorrowfully admits the fact, though he explains it by saying that such men were never children of God, and they deceived themselves and deceived the Church; or else they were Christians, and will yet be saved through discipline that God will use to bring them back to his fold. It is of these men I would speak this morning.

We are down by the Pool of Bethesda. In all probability, this was a mineral spring, like a Yellowstone geyser. Samuel Barnes thinks it may have been. At certain times this pool erupted, and at the first troubling of the waters they had a curative quality attributed to angelic action upon them. The sick and the diseased would gather there ready to plunge in at the auspicious moment. The first who stepped into the water at that time was cured of his or her ailment. But one poor man was there, who was so weak and slow in his movements that he could not enter alone. He seemed to have no friends. Reading between the lines, I think this man's sickness may have been the result of a past evil life. Sin and physical agony are sometimes but not always concomitants of each other. Jesus saw and had compassion on him, and cured him. Then Jesus meets him afterward in the temple and speaks the words of my text: "Behold, thou art made whole; sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee."

Worse than Helplessness

We may wonder what there could be worse than the man had endured. To lie there day after day for thirty-eight years, suffering from paralysis, or rheumatism, or some other ailment that rendered him helpless, was surely bad enough. But Jesus thought there were worse things than that, and they might come upon him if he fell into sin. The warning comes with additional force to us, because we have been accustomed to regard the miracle as a type of conversion. We should therefore ask ourselves in what respect the calamities that come from sin are worse than physical helplessness.

The backslider, in the first place, is haunted by the gruesome spectre of a poignant, never-ceasing remorse. He has enjoyed the inspiring hope of salvation. He has tasted the ineffable sweets of the Gospel. He is like the prodigal in the far country. He was not born of swine-keeping parents. He was not treated as a social outcast. He was cradled in the old homestead and knew what a loving mother's smile was. He knew what honor and affection and respectability meant. But he deliberately went and flung all away and turned his back upon the things that make life worth living. In his misfortunes after his poverty came upon him, wherever he went, and whatever he did, he kept picturing to himself the plenty and happiness of his father's home. Do you suppose a man who has once lived in a comfortable house on a respectable street, with a loving family and amid kind friends, could ever be happy to go and dwell among social outcasts, if he knew that he was the direct cause of his own disgrace?

A Beer-Drinker's Resolve

Some years ago, a young Scotchman came across the seas and settled in this country. He married here and had two little children whom he loved dearly. But he was one of those who drifted into dissipation through sociability, as so many have done before him. The men always used to take a drink before they started work. Then they would break off work about ten o'clock and take another drink. Then they would always take a drink at noon, and so on during the day. This habit began to get its merciless hold upon him. One evening, on his way home from work, a sleigh was dashing down the street. Before he knew it, the horse was almost upon him. He leaped back just in time to escape being knocked down. As he did this, two women beautifully dressed in furs laughed contemptuously at his predicament. The man began to think. Why was he walking when other people could ride, and almost ride over him, and treat it all as a joke? Who were these rude rich people? Looking after them he recognized these women as the wife and daughter of the saloon-keeper from whom he and his fellow workmen bought their daily drink.

As he watched the sleigh disappearing, he said, "You have had the last dollar you will get from me. From now on I am going to buy my wife furs, and give my children a home, instead of supporting you."

It Pays to Do Right

The next morning, when the men broke off work and said, "Come on, Joe, let's go and take a sip," he replied, "No! I have given that saloon-keeper the last dollar he will ever have of mine. I am going to buy my wife and bairns a home, instead of supporting his family in luxury." The men laughed. "All right," said Joe. "You'll see." And in a couple of years, that workman had enough money which he had saved from the saloon to buy a city lot and build a little home. That workman to-day is one of the leading merchants in one of our Western cities. Does it pay? Does it pay to be good? Does it pay to do right? And, my friends, if it does pay to do right, how great must be the remorse that comes when a man realizes that by his own sins, his own follies, his own evil deeds, he has brought poverty and misery upon himself and those he loves?

You are not like a man who has been brought up in an irreligious home. You know what the beauties and joys of the Gospel life mean. You have seen this happiness revealed in your father's and mother's lives. You have felt the joy of the Gospel in your own life. If I mistake not, some years ago you joined the church. You have been a worker in the Master's vineyard. Tell me, are you going to put all that past joy away? Are you going to turn your back upon the only life which you know is worth living? Are you going to-day to grip hands with sin and then endure the evil results of the sin you have brought upon yourself and your dear ones? Remember that the condition of the man who has once known the Christian hope and has departed from it, is infinitely worse than that of the man who has never known it at all. For then the spectre of remorse points her finger at you and says, "You have brought this misery upon yourself, and you alone are responsible." And "Jesus findeth him in the temple and said unto him, Behold, thou art made whole; sin no more, lest a worse thing come upon thee."

The Pendulum's Swing

But when the backslider relapses into evil, he does more than clasp hands with sin. He not only seeks sin, but he turns his back upon God and the good people with whom he used to associate. As the pendulum swinging in one direction gathers momentum, and swings just as far in the other direction, so the backslider, when he goes astray, is apt to go further astray because he has once been good. As remorse gnaws at his heart, so ingratitude makes him go just as far away from good associates as he possibly can go.

Here, for instance, is a young fellow whom you have made your protegee. You felt you had the means and ought to help some one in life. So this boy appealed to your sympathies and you took him to your heart. You educated him and started him in business. You pushed him rapidly forward. You gave him an interest in the firm. You loved him as a son. Time passed on. Suddenly you awoke to an awful fact. You found that this young man whom you had loved, had desecrated your home. You found that he had broken every law of justice and honor and truth. The meanest human cur that ever crawled in slime, could not be more untrue to you than he has been. What do you do? Do you upbraid him and make him suffer the penalty of the law? No. Like a loving father, your heart is broken. You would like to forgive him. You would even like to give him another start. But he will not let you love him. He will flee away from you. He will get just as far away as he can. Like Absalom of old, all that he will do is to associate with your enemies. And all that you can do is to go weeping to your bed-chamber as you cry, "Oh, my son Absalom, my son! my son Absalom! Would God I had died for thee!" Now, my brother, is that the kind of ingratitude you mean to show to God? Are you about to drift into sin? Are you going to turn your back upon Christ? Are you ready to separate yourself from those sweet Christian associations which contribute to our spiritual life? Remember this: no Christian man ever flung himself into sin but he proved himself an ingrate, and his shame led him to get just as far away from God and from his people as he could go.

There is another fact which the Christian must bear well in mind. Though the Gospel life grows sweeter and purer and more triumphant the longer a man lives it, yet the old scars of sin remain indelible. And when a Christian backslides, it is like the relapse of an attack of typhoid fever or pneumonia. The relapse is always more dangerous than the first attack. Then the physical organism is weakened. Then the disease can the more easily attack the vital parts. You and I had better beware. We ought never to let those old wounds of sin reopen. If they are once allowed to bleed again, there will be a hemorrhage which will sap away our life.

Slain by a Shell

You know there is an old proverb among the soldiers that in time of war no two bullets ever struck twice in the same place. But that is not always true. Dr. Ryan, in his book entitled, Under the Red Crescent, gives a vivid account of the siege of Kalafat. The bullets were falling in a perfect hurricane. Suddenly there came tumbling over the wall a monster shell, and it crashed into the ground and burst, tearing a great hole out of the earth as large as a house. A poor frightened mother gathered her three children about her and ran to this hole for protection. But hardly had she settled herself there than there was heard the singing of another shell flying from a gun two miles away, and it flung itself into that hole and tore those four human beings into shreds. "Oh," you say, "that was horrible; that was gruesome; that was overpowering!" Yes, it was. It was tragic because it was so unusual for two shells to strike the same place. But I want to tell you that when Satan aims his guns for bombardment, he has been hitting us in the same way for the last twenty years. And just as a prize-fighter can keep tapping an adversary in the same place over the heart until he saps away his antagonist's strength, so Satan can keep battering at the old wounds of our former sins and open them in their weakened condition, until at last we fall before his blows as helpless as the trembling fawn before the plunge of a jungle tiger. Beware of that old sin. O man, if you start it again in its bleeding, in all probability you will never close it up. Beware!

Vitality of an Old Enemy

I have heard my father again and again tell this tragic story: In his Philadelphia church he had an elder he dearly loved. The elder was a Scotchman, who stood about six feet two and was magnificently proportioned. He was a nobleman in brain and in heart. He was one of those great big, lovable fellows who hold you with a grip of steel. This man, then nearly sixty years of age, had been dissipated in his youth. He had once been a drunkard. But for forty years of his life he had lived a pure, true, consistent Christian life. But one day, under a hot summer sun, he became dizzy with a sunstroke. He stepped into a nearby drug-store for help. The druggist, not knowing his old weakness, gave him a glass of liquor. That one glass revived the old passion. He started forth from that drug-store to the nearest saloon. He drank until he was drunk. He drank himself into the gutter. And in six months he drank himself into the grave. Beware, O man, of that old sin!

When I was a boy I heard John B. Gough talking along the same line. There he stood before me, an on the cheek of her dead son, Prince Luiz. Silent and sleepless she sat, speaking to none, while troops guarded all the entrances. Few slept in Lisbon that night. In the evening all the shops, cafes and theatres had been closed. Houses were barricaded and streets cleared, for there was a general dread of a revolutionary rising. But there was no outbreak, and next morning, when Premier Franco proclaimed the accession of Prince Manuel and shortly afterward a new Cabinet was announced, the tension was relaxed and it was generally felt that the dreaded crisis had temporarily passed.

King Carlos' reign has been a troubled one. He was born in 1863 and ascended the throne in 1889. There were some in Portugal who regarded him as a usurper, as he belonged only to the female line of the royal house of Braganza, Duke Miguel de Braganza being the claimant in the direct line of male succession. Carlos, in 1886, married Princess Marie Amelie of Orleans, daughter of the Comte de Paris, head of the old royal house of France. Their two sons were Luiz Filipe, born 1887 (who perished with his father), and Manuel, the second son, born 1889.

Carlos was a good-natured, easy-going ruler, large of frame and fond of athletics. From the outset, his rule encountered a strong republican sentiment, and his management of governmental affairs was frequently criticized. Besides, it was unfortunate that the opportunities were afforded for the development of a strong socialistic movement, especially in the commercial cities. There were many factional wrangles in the Portuguese Parliament or Cortes, and the necessary appropriations to carry on the government could not be passed. King Carlos repeatedly warned the wrangling factionists that they must harmonize their differences and transact the necessary business, but his efforts at conciliation were futile. One cabinet succeeded another at brief intervals, but none could deal satisfactorily with the situation, and public affairs were rapidly becoming chaotic.

This was the situation when, on May 11, 1907, the King decided on a bold stroke. He issued a decree, abolishing the Constitution, and proclaimed Senhor Joao Ferreira Franco, one of the ablest Liberal leaders (but opposed to the Republicans), as Dictator. This extra-constitutional movement immediately set the whole country in a ferment. Outbreaks occurred in many cities, and there was a sanguinary riot in Lisbon, which Franco put down with the strong hand, using the army for the purpose. The Dictator, who was firmly supported by the King, believed in vigorous measures. He refused all appeals to reconvene the Cortes until he had assurances that factionism would cease and the Cortes would do the royal bidding.

It was a critical time. Carlos was warned by King Victor of Italy and from other quarters that the wiser policy would be to return to constitutional methods; but Franco was inflexible. The King absented himself from public functions and spent much time with the army. The Crown Prince visited the colonies in Africa.

crisis, which had such a tragic denouement, the King was actuated by a desire for what he conceived to be the country's best welfare. He claimed, and truthfully, that the attitude of the factions had made public business impossible, and that it was necessary to take strong financial measures of economy to meet the steadily growing deficit. His resolute extra-constitutional attitude and Franco's dictatorship precipitated the tragedy. There were many premonitions of the approaching storm which could not have been unnoticed. King Edward of England had personally written to King Carlos, warning him of the revolutionary plots and urging measures of safety; but the King was confident and disdainful of danger to the last hour of his life.

After the accession of Manuel, there was a temporary lull, which raised hopes that the worst was over, and that the country would quickly return to normal conditions. But soon another storm arose, when the work of forming a new cabinet was begun. Franco, who had been the late King's evil genius, retired, and it was said he would leave the country, lest his powerful influence should assert itself in the new regime. Some who had been his open enemies, were given places in the new ministry. On February 7, the cabinet stood as follows:

Premier—Vice-Admiral Ferreira de Amara. Minister of War—Sebastian Tolles. Justice—Campos Henriques. Finance—Alfonso Esperguera. Foreign Affairs—Wenceslau de Lima. Public Works—Senhor Calvet Magalhaes. Marine—Augusto de Castilho.

Premier Amaral, speaking for the new administration, said that its immediate aim would be to restore calm to the nation and bring back normal conditions. He believed the people were attached to the monarchy and would be loyal to King Manuel. It was understood that the new Cabinet will at once repeal the dictatorial decrees of ex-Premier Franco, and that the Cortes will be convoked and constitutional methods re-established.

King Manuel is a young man of very agreeable manners and charming disposition. He has had little training for diplomacy, the efforts of his father in this direction having been largely directed to equipping his elder brother Luiz for the duties of the throne. The young king, who seems to be a popular favorite, will necessarily rely on his ministers absolutely. In his proclamation, issued on assuming sovereignty, he pledges himself to abide by the Constitution and to do all in his power to promote the good of the fatherland and merit the affection of the Portuguese people.

On his return, he urged his father to return to constitutional methods, and warned him that if he did not do so, it might mean revolution and the overthrow of the throne.

Meanwhile, the opposition grew, and Premier Franco decided to check public opinion by a rigid press censorship. Several journals were suspended. As the indications of an approaching crisis increased, many Republicans and not a few Conservatives left the country. The air was full of alarming rumors of revolutionary risings.

It is not questioned, however, that during the whole old gray-haired man. I suppose he had persuaded more people to sign the temperance pledge than any man who had ever lived. He was not only a leader of men, but the leader of leaders in the temperance reform. And yet that man, who for forty years had been pleading the temperance cause, said: "Man, if you have once been a drunkard, never dare trust yourself with this sin. It has been nearly half a century since the old passion, by the grace of God, lost its hold on me. But the old passion is still there. It is manacled and kenneled, but it is there. I would no more touch a glass of liquor than I would dare take a dagger and drive it in my heart. I would no more dare touch a piece of brandied mince pie than I would dare touch a lighted match to a gunpowder magazine. It is there. The old slumbering passion is there, ready to be awakened at a word." And yet some people suppose that because they have been resisting sin ten, twenty, forty, fifty years, the old forces of sin are dead. Beware, O man! The relapse of sin is always more dangerous than the first condition. The passion is still there. It is there in your sinful heart.

It is when we are not afraid of sin that the dangers of sin become fourfold. Travelers tell us that the wolves of Mexico have a strange way of catching the wild horses. These horses have the speed of the wind. It is almost impossible for a single cowboy to catch one. The cowboys, when they wish to run them down, have relays of pursuers. First one set of cowboys will chase the horses. Then another relay will take up the run. Then another, and another, until at last the horses are caught by the lasso. But it is only when they are completely tired that they are caught; therefore it would be impossible for the wolves to catch them unless they used strategy, for the wolves' flight is not as swift as the horses'.

This is the way the wolves kill the wild horses of the Mexican plains: First a couple of wolves come out of the woods and begin to play together like two kittens. They gambol about each other and run backward and forward. Then the herd of horses lift their startled heads, and get ready to stampede. But the wolves seem to be so playful, that the horses, after watching them awhile, forget their fears, and continue to graze. Then the wolves in their play come nearer and nearer, while other wolves slowly and stealthily creep after them. Then suddenly the enemies surround the herd and make one plunge, and the horses are struggling with the fangs of the relentless foes gripped in their throats. In a similar way our old sins cunningly attack us. They play about us and keep playing around us, and they look so harmless, and we feel so strong. But suddenly they make a plunge, and the old wounds are reopened and we are helpless in the grasp of the monsters of sin. Beware of that relapse into sin. "Behold, thou art made whole; sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee."

But though Christ is speaking the same thought as Paul spoke in Corinthians, when he said, "Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall," thank God, Christ does not stop there. He warns the man at the Pool of Bethesda; but he also teaches the doctrine that he is the Christ of the back-slider. When Christ starts forth to save an immortal soul, he is no respecter of persons. He can save the backslider. There is an incident told of the famous Edward Irving, the eloquent preacher. When a boy in Scotland, with his little sister he went down on the sands of Solway Firth to meet his uncle, who was coming to visit their home. When the tide comes in there, it comes with a rush. It sweeps on like a flood. All the people there know this danger of the onrushing sea, and guard against it; but these little children forgot the time of the tide. They were playing in a little pool of water. Suddenly a horseman dashed down from the mountain-side. Without a word he came up on a run, grabbed the two children, flung them across the saddle and started for the hills. Faster and faster followed the rising tide, but at last the horseman and his precious load were saved. Then the uncle saw that he had saved his own brother's children, who had come out to meet him. So it is with Christ. It matters not who the sinner may be, nor whether he has sinned seventy times seven; if you go out to meet Christ, he will save you from the tidal waves of sin, and save you now.

God works through natural and human agencies, as well as by his word and power. This Pool of Bethesda may have been merely a geyser or a mineral spring. It is a better remedy that I offer you. It never ceases; it never loses its power:

Lift up thy bleeding hand, O Lord:
Unseal that cleansing tide.
We have no shelter from our sins,
But in thy wounded side.

WAR ON RACE-TRACK GAMBLING

THE race gambling trust of New York has within a few years past attempted to extend its monopoly to New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, the District of Columbia, and other commonwealths. Its ambition seems to be to make racing, with gambling and consequent profit to itself, the national sport, taking the place of base-ball. The battle now on in the New York Legislature is therefore of moment to the whole country; indeed, the result is likely to promote or check gambling even in foreign lands.

Gov. Chris. E. Hughes, New York

In 1887, licensed gambling was inaugurated in New York in the Ives Pool Bill, which permitted gambling on race-tracks only, while making it a prison offense elsewhere. The avowed purpose of the bill was to "restrict" gambling by making it impossible anywhere, except on race-tracks managed by people of great respectability. The persons licensed sought the great profits involved regardless of moral considerations. The pool-rooms continued as before, and the licensed racetracks served as feeders to start those who would never have begun to gamble in an illegal joint.

The effect of that Ives bill in demoralization and embezzlements was so bad that, when a convention was held in 1894 to revise the State Constitution, the largest interest centered in killing that bill by an article in the Constitution forbidding every form of gambling, which was submitted by a convention vote of 109 to 4, and endorsed by the people by 90,000 majority. This article required the Legislature to enact laws to carry it into effect. The next Legislature, that of 1895, did the exact opposite; restored the Ives bill in a thin disguise under the new name of the Percy-Gray law, which its framers claimed was designed to carry out the mandate of the Constitution. In this bill, all gambling outside of licensed race-tracks was again made a State prison offense; but the only penalty for gambling on the race-tracks was the right of the loser to sue for his losses, if he was mean enough and foolish enough to undertake such a proceeding.

There was also a seeming limit of racing by any one association to thirty days, when in fact the same men were interested in seven tracks within trolley ride of New York's City Hall, and three more in the State, that together keep up race gambling six days per week for more than half the year. There was more hypocrisy in the assumption that by withholding any receipt—a rascality in itself—the professional gamblers who spend all their time in inducing others to bet were not bookmakers, but gentlemen making "casual bets" with their acquaintances.

This bookmaking grew more and more bold until, when the writer investigated it in 1903 in Saratoga and elsewhere, there were on every track two betting rings, one for the rich and another for the poor, in both of which the gamblers, sitting on high chairs, with two assistants, invited bets by outcries or exposed signs, received the money of their victims openly, booked the bets, while police of the gamblers' own appointment enabled them to deal swiftly and severely with any who did not abide by their decisions. The writer has himself seen persons who claimed money won waved threateningly aside, without any chance of redress, because they had no receipt.

For ten years the Percy-Gray law worked havoc unchecked. Instead of decreasing gambling, as its framers claimed it would, their own reports showed a constant increase inside the tracks. That outside gambling had not materially decreased was made sufficiently manifest when it was found, a few years since, that the illegal pool-rooms paid two millions of the profits of a great telegraph company in return for racing news officially supplied as a basis of their operations. Meantime the New York World said the gambling at Saratoga for twenty days each year was not less than two millions a day, totaling as much in twenty-two days as the gambling of Monte Carlo in ten years. As there are ten tracks, the estimate of the Evening Mail is conservative, that the total economic waste each year (let Chambers of Commerce note) is not less than two hundred and ten millions of dollars! But the moral waste is infinitely greater—the ruined manhood, ay, and womanhood, for the respectability given to racing by the supervision of millionaires has drawn to the races audiences in large part women, and apparently respectable women.

In 1905, the writer, having heard that Governor Higgins had recalled, in a private conversation, his voting as a State Senator in 1895, almost alone, against the Percy-Gray law, took that as a signal for an attack on the law by the Reform Bureau, which had fought these same gamblers successfully when they invaded the District of Columbia and Pennsylvania. A bill was drawn by Mr. Anthony Comstock to make bookmakers on race tracks liable to the same penalty as professional gamblers outside, and there was a legislative hearing on the subject, but no result.

Rev. A. S. Gregg, of the Reform Bureau, who had been the anti-gambling leader in 1905, was in 1906 reinforced by Dr. Sanford, of the Federation of Churches, and there was again a campaign of lecturing and literature distribution, but the gamblers were saved from defeat by the officers of the agricultural fairs, whom they had taken good care to bribe by a share in the gambling profits, remembering that the rural parts of the State are the ones that are most to be feared by those who seek to "frame mischief by a law." Governor Hughes was petitioned by many to take a hand in the anti-gambling fight.

It is probable that the most effective and decisive of these appeals was that of Sheriff Michael J. Flaherty, of Brooklyn, whose constituents were the victims of six race-tracks in and near New York. Asked by good citizens to suppress the gambling on these tracks, he found they were securely protected by the infamous Percy-Gray law, and appealed to the Governor to use his influence for its repeal.

When Governor Hughes, in 1908, issued his message, a startling surprise to the State was his appeal to the Legislature to obey the anti-gambling mandate of the Constitution by repealing the Percy-Gray law, so far as it gave immunity to gamblers on race-tracks, and by punishing all gamblers by imprisonment, since fines to rich gamblers would serve only as license fees. He also recommended a direct appropriation to agricultural fairs, in place of their share in the profits of gambling. Strangely enough, these gamblers, who have for years charged all reformers who attack them with being the catspaws, consciously or by deception, of the outside pool-rooms, have even dared to publish this charge again when the Governor himself is leading the fight. They will have a hard task to convince the people of New York that Governor Hughes is being manipulated by the gamblers who are shut out of the trust, in his effort to send all gamblers, inside or out, to jail. Not relying only on charging that bad men are back of their opponents, the gamblers proclaim the names of some kings and magnates who have favored racing, but it would be more to the point to cite some great names that favor the nullification of constitutional law, since that is the real issue more than racing or even gambling.

The one plea for continuance of the race-tracks that will need most attention is that gambling cannot be suppressed, and that the present method is the best way to "restrict" it. But the licensed race-track gambling has multiplied the gambling outside and inside. It has killed the enforcement of anti-gambling laws, because to prosecute outside gamblers was only to corral them into the gambling trust. The pool-room is only the peanut stand in gambling, while the crowded race-track, where twenty-five to fifty thousand are swept into the wild frenzy of betting and losing millions a day, is the worst of all forms of gambling for that reason, and because it is the starting-point where gamblers "get on the train."

Meantime Senator George B. Agnew, of New York City, and Assemblyman M. K. Hart, of Utica, have introduced identical bills in the two houses of the New York Legislature, one providing a direct appropriation for agricultural fairs, and another providing that all professional gamblers, rich and poor, on race-tracks or outside, shall be liable to imprisonment. To carry these bills we must use petitions, and letters, and telegrams, and deputations.

In order to get even Christians to generally demand this legislation, there must be a campaign of education, because a dozen years of wholesale gambling on race-tracks, often attended by fifty thousand people and patronized by persons of high social position, have dulled the convictions even of church members. They need to be shown what gambling essentially is under its many disguises. "When it is determined by chance," says the New York Supreme Court, "what or how much one shall get for his money, it is a lottery." That is a counterfeit-detector that every honest man should carry in his memory.

But the fundamental reason why gambling is a sin, is that it is trifling with trust funds. When a man with the biggest salary in the world was reported as having "broken the bank" at Monte Carlo, he had to resign, because instinctively the whole nation felt he was not the man to handle trust funds. But all our possessions are trust funds from God, to be used for the good of men, not recklessly tossed on the waves of chance.

As if gambling, the oldest, meanest, saddest of the vices, was not bad enough, it is in New York made worse by harnessing it in a four-in-hand, whose other beasts are monopoly, hypocrisy, and bribery.

Of all monopolies the gambling trust is the worst, for in it, by specific laws—not by mere tricks of commerce, as in other cases—rich men are given monopoly privileges in a vice. The bribery of the agriculturists in New York State has been done in full sight of the world for a dozen years. Can any one doubt the same bribers have corrupted officials and that large section of the press which publishes only the sophistry of the gamblers' press bureau?

The vast profits of furnishing gambling resorts, protected against the police by law, are the manifest motive of all the pretended zeal to "improve the breed of horses," and the pretense of reforming gambling. These men even pretend to know nothing of the gambling for which they furnish the "ring" and paraphernalia. Even card-players rule out of their clubs one who does not "play fair." By the gambler's code, these tricksters of the gambling trust should be cast out even by gamblers themselves. The fundamental idea of their whole proceeding—that the professional bookmakers in their betting ring are not bookmakers at all—is not only hypocrisy, but absolute untruth.

Ten civic societies have now joined the International Reform Bureau in this crusade, and are seeking, by lectures and literature, to inform and arouse and express public sentiment. Petitions and documents may be had by applying to Rev. W. F. Crafts, 9 Lodge Street, Albany, N. Y., or to Rev. Walter Laidlaw, 119 East Nineteenth Street, New York City. The opportunity is offered to fight the gamblers and their monopoly successfully. Inasmuch as the gamblers have published in their report that they spent $39,000 last year in defeating the anti-gambling bill in the New York Legislature, and will doubtless spend ten times as much this year to win in this urgent fight, good citizens should hasten to send financial reinforcements to those on the "firing line." Any funds sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for this purpose will be applied to the anti-gambling campaign now being conducted by the International Reform Bureau against the race-track gamblers of the Empire State.

Among the Workers

Miss Lulu B. Lacey and sister, 3 Washburn Terrace, Saugerties, N. Y., would be pleased to hear from some evangelist who wishes the services of two trained Gospel singers in his work.

REVIVAL MEETINGS were held at Hazel Valley, Mo., recently, of two and a half weeks' continuance, resulting in many conversions and a number of reclamations. Rev. J. J. Henly, pastor, was assisted by Rev. Frank Geisenheiner, an evangelist from Decatur, Ill.

THE EVANGELISTIC SERVICES conducted by Rev. H. D. Sheldon in the Westville District during the recent campaign in New Haven, Conn., by Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., were very successful. The community was stirred and many decisions for Christ were made.

EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANN, of Fairbury, Ill., have just closed a revival in Fulton, N. Y., of three weeks' duration. There were over nine hundred seekers, and great crowds thronged the First Methodist Church nightly. Over two hundred united with the churches in the closing service.

Rev. Dr. WM. MAURICE STONEHILL, pastor of the East Side Parish M. E. Church, and familiarly known as "The Bishop of the Bowery," is dead. He was greatly beloved by the poor of the East Side, and there was a large gathering at his funeral. Dr. Stonehill was the founder of several churches before he came to New York, and was also the originator of a summer vacation work on Long Island.

ESTHER ABRAHAM, the well-known Eastern mission worker, writes from Urdi, Persia, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows: "I have heard that some one is collecting money in my name in America for my work. I will say to God's people, it is not true. I have not sent anybody and will not do so now. I hope THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will inform the American people to this effect. The need of our orphanage is very great, but I can take no more orphans, as I have neither room nor food for them."

MOTHERS TO MEET IN WASHINGTON

DELEGATES FROM MANY STATES WILL DISCUSS TOPICS OF VITAL INTEREST

Mrs. Walter S. Brown, Ia.

Mrs. W. B. Ferguson, Conn.

The Late Mrs. Theodore Birney

THE latest enterprise of the National Congress of Mothers is the calling of an international assembly to meet in Washington, March 10 to 17. Mrs. Frederick Schoff, National President, will preside at the meeting, which will be welcomed by President and Mrs. Roosevelt for its opening session at the White House, when the President will deliver an address. The event marks the first meeting of mothers of all lands, and it signalizes the inauguration of a new era of world-wide extension of the mother movement inaugurated by the late Mrs. Theodore Birney, Christian wife and mother, a decade ago. Her passing, during the year just closed, has left a legacy of duty which her co-workers cheerfully assume, believing that the best memorial to her life of devoted effort is the winning of other lives consecrated to the safeguarding of the highest ideals of home and our Christian nation.

"We saw that the professions of law, medicine, engineering, and education would not allow a member of these respective departments even to hang up a sign until he had a diploma, a degree, or some other proof of legitimate work done. Yet we mothers, representing the highest calling on earth, had the task of establishing homes and training immortal beings, with no thought of fitness and no scruple for lack of training. . . . We felt very humble as we looked into the trusting and inquiring faces of our children. We admitted, at least to ourselves, our total lack of wisdom to guide them through the complexities of this life, much less those of that which is to come."

In these words a thoughtful Colorado mother, a member of the State Congress of Mothers, described the conscientious convictions which she and others felt when grouping themselves together in a definite purpose to become "trained mothers." They were all college-bred women, and their circle became a class which employed a Christian professor of pedagogy, who led them to seek the best things for themselves and their children. The study of Solomon's wisdom and the Scriptural precepts for health and happiness was pursued with that of modern psychologists and pedagogues. During two college years, the earnest mothers had these lessons. They copied outlines and took ample notes. When possible, they did some original research work, and at the close of the course each mother wrote her thesis, which was passed upon by the college faculty. The college had a "mother's certificate" engraved and used the first time for this class. It testified to work done by the holder in child-study.

The work of this Colorado Mothers' Circle is illustrative of the advanced parent-training work going on under the auspices of the National Mothers' Congress. It was Mrs. Henry J. Hersey of Denver, President of the Colorado State Congress of Mothers, who organized this noteworthy Mothers' Circle, which has now become a local home and school association.

Mrs. Hersey, who is one of the new leaders in the esteemed group of national vice-presidents of the National Congress of Mothers, is a transplanted New Englander, and deeply interested in church and philanthropic work in Denver, where she has made her home for nearly a quarter of a century. "In doing Mothers' Congress work," she says, "I am serving both God and native land."

Mrs. Frank R. Hill, the well-known child-rescue worker of Tacoma, now represents the mothers' movement in Washington State, where the care of dependent, defective and delinquent children is the keynote of the Mothers' Congress work. A skilled artist, with all the prestige of a complete European culture, Mrs. Hill finds her greatest joy in ameliorating the condition of oppressed and neglected children, and in forming women like-minded into circles to carry on the important work.

The educational work of the Illinois Congress of Mothers begun so auspiciously by a trained teacher-mother, Mrs. Wm. Hefferan, former president, has been continued successfully by the new president, Mrs. George Brill of Chicago, who is especially interested in the boy problem, in the establishment of public playgrounds and in the probation system. The Illinois Congress of Mothers is also active in the formation of the popular home and school associations which bring parents and teachers so happily into harmony in the training of children.

A former teacher, wife of a city school superintendent, and mother of a family, is Mrs. Walter B. Ferguson of Middleton, Conn., who now leads the work of the Congress of Mothers in the Nutmeg State. Her children grown, she is giving her thoughtful attention and care to the extension of mother work in the State. Through the influence of the Congress of Mothers, Connecticut now has a juvenile court law, and the work of organizing home and school associations has been earnestly promoted.

The co-operation of home and school is a special effort of many State Congresses, and is regarded as the leading outlet for the activity of the Congress of Mothers and as a field peculiarly suited to its plans and purposes. In New Jersey, the organization of Home School Associations has been a special feature during the past year under the able direction of Mrs. Alexander Marcy, of Riverton, the new State President. The Pennsylvania Congress of Mothers, of which Mrs. George K. Johnson is the present leader, is also focusing its endeavors on this line of work with success. In Philadelphia, a City League of Home and School Associations (of which Mrs. Edwin C. Grice, National Secretary of the National Congress of Mothers, is founder and leader) has been formed as an auxiliary to the State Congress of Mothers. Over 3,000 members and a score of associations are united in this league. In Iowa, where Mrs. Walter Brown, an earnest mother of Des Moines, is leader, the State Congress of Mothers has been affiliated with the State Teachers' Association, thus forming the largest and most inclusive Home and School Association yet organized. LATER ACCOUNTS FROM BOYERTOWN

FOR some time after the terrible catastrophe at Boyertown, Pa., where about two hundred people were either killed or injured in the fire of the Opera House, many conflicting reports were sent out to the newspapers of the country.

The whole affair happened so rapidly, and so many of the people who could have given an accurate account of the affair perished, that even at the present time, people who saw part of the fire, or escaped from the building, cannot agree upon all points, each one having seen some one thing that stamped itself upon the memory, while others escaped them.

Dr. D. R. Kohler, Burgess of the town, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that there are certain facts in connection with the fire which, in justice to the authorities, should be set right, and that some statements printed were unjust to the town officials and the firemen. He says especially that none of the local firemen were intoxicated, nor were any of the Pottstown firemen under the influence of liquor.

He wrote that he ordered the saloons closed on account of "bums," who came to town and showed signs of intoxication. He said no gasoline tank was used in the Opera House. In fairness to all concerned we publish Dr. Kohler's statement in accordance with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's invariable policy "to give the other side."

Rev. George Greenawald, of the Reformed Church of the Good Shepherd, who arrived within fifteen minutes after the first alarm, says that the disturbance at the fire lines has been greatly exaggerated. He said that what trouble there was came from a few people unknown to him and who came from outside the town. The trouble was suppressed very promptly by members of the State police.

The Burgess said, in answer to a query, that he closed the saloons about five o'clock the morning after the fire, and turned the town over to the Constabulary, who put it under martial law, and preserved order until their services were no longer needed.

Pastor Greenawald said he saw, when comparing some accounts, that the article published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was milder than those that appeared in some other well-known publications.

VALUING OTHERS

AT the Great International Convention of the Young Men's Christian Association recently held in Washington, one of the informal missionary conferences drew forth the following testimony: A Christian layman, prominent among those who have gone around the world under the direction of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, said that he was impressed in China with the character and spirit of the missionaries, both native and foreign. Every man had something good to say of his colleague. Almost every city or village entered, called forth from the missionary in charge the remark, "If you think the work here is going well, you ought to see how splendidly it is going in the next village, or next city," and then some words of commendable and affectionate appreciation of the man working there. Can any greater testimony be given of the ruling, triumphant spirit of Jesus Christ among his followers? Is there not a great lesson in these facts here at home? "If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us." "And this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God, loveth his brother also."

A Church Question

THERE is scarcely any question of church administration so generally discussed as that of responsibility for the finances. How to raise the money for current expenses; how to keep up the church's contributions to missions and the benevolent boards, and frequently how to reduce or wholly liquidate the debt on the edifice—these are problems of a very perplexing nature. They are inseparable from church association, and must be solved honestly and faithfully. No church can afford to have it said that it is deficient in common honesty and does not meet its obligations punctually. For the sake of its name as a Christian church, it must provide "things honest in the sight of men."

That the finances will take care of themselves, or that the members of the church will, without organization, spontaneously provide the required income, no church officer believes. It is a matter of experience that unless some one takes hold of the business and presses it on the attention of the members, there will be a regular and increasing deficit in the accounts. It is sometimes difficult to find such a man, for it is a disagreeable duty to be continually reminding the brethren that they must give; but it is a duty some one must perform. Some members are reluctant to contribute, some habitually avoid all giving, and some simply do not think about it. It is necessary to impress upon all the importance of bearing a share of the burden and that to shirk the duty is a sin against God. But the man who undertakes it is seldom popular and his calls are unwelcomed.

Who should undertake the duty? In many churches it is left entirely to the pastor. It is held that he can perform it effectively from the pulpit, and with more force than any officer or private member. Also that, being personally interested to the extent of his salary, he has a strong incentive to plead for money. Besides, his success will raise his ministerial reputation. The clergyman renowned for having cleared a debt off a church, for having reorganized the finances of a church, finds, when he seeks a new sphere, that he is esteemed in some communities more highly than if the membership of his former church had doubled during his pastorate. These are some of the reasons for the pastor undertaking the responsibility for the finances of his church. On the other hand, there are some who hold that the pastor's duty of preaching the Gospel is enough for any one man; that he ought not in common delicacy to be expected to plead in a cause in which he is personally interested; also that his thoughts and energies should not be diverted from his first and chief business; and that the duty of raising money should be committed to some active lay member.

Differences of opinion on the subject are found in all the churches, and it would be advantageous to have them intelligently discussed. We therefore invite our readers to express their opinions briefly in answer to the question: Is it good for the church and the minister, either or both, that the responsibility for raising the necessary income of the church should be in the hands of the minister, or should it not rather devolve upon some church board or officer? Write your views briefly and address them: "Church Finance," care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Regicide in Portugal

GRIEF and indignation have been manifested here, as in Europe, at the cowardly murder of the King of Portugal and his eldest son. It was a brutal crime without reason or justification. The stupidity of it is obvious, when it is remembered that the two victims represented opposite policies of government. The King's offense was in establishing a temporary autocratic rule; but what could be the offense of the Crown Prince, who opposed such rule? The coarse brutality of the Portuguese revolutionists in indiscriminately butchering the man whom they regarded as an oppressor, and the man who opposed him, is apparent on the surface. The blind rage which slaughters friend and foe without distinction, is a thing to be dreaded in any community, and those orators or journalists who incite it in any land incur a fearful responsibility.

This crime appears to have recoiled on its perpetrators, as former crimes of the kind have done. It has evoked an outburst of sympathy and loyalty to the royal family, which surprises all. It may be shortlived, but it certainly exists. The Portuguese people are horrified at the murder of their affable, good-natured King, whose unpopularity was but recent, and was due to his support of a reformer of too hasty and tactless a nature. The King might have been emancipated from the influence of his adviser and might have yielded to the wishes of the public, but to murder him was to delay all possibility of reform. As in the case of Alexander II., of Russia, assassination is likely to thwart the objects of the perpetrators.

Long ago, Fouché told Napoleon that a certain murder was "worse than a crime; it was a blunder." In the eyes of politicians, blunders are always worse than crimes; but they have not yet learned that crime is always a blunder. It is defiance of God's law, and history shows that it does not succeed. "The face of the Lord is against them that do evil." Men smile in these days at the idea of providential control of the world's events, but even these might learn from the past. The events that are denominated coincidences show that God does rule and brings to naught the devices and crimes of violent and deceitful men.

Education and Christianity

A READER of this journal writes to inquire whether education, in the modern sense, does not include Christianity, and whether one cannot be a true Christian without education.

One of the best Christians the writer ever knew was a negro woman, 109 years old, who could neither read nor write; yet her heart was full of the grace of God, and his loving promises were ever on her lips. Another was a workingman of very limited education; yet he was a walking evangel. Dwight L. Moody was not an educated man; yet he was a power for Christianity among the masses in America. The disciples, whom Christ himself chose, were mostly simple fishermen, with presumably very little education; yet they were spirit-filled, and their training in the Gospel made them mighty men for the work of the Kingdom.

Education, in the modern sense, while it could not be complete without including the history of Christianity, would not necessarily of itself make one a Christian. All the teachings of the schools and colleges and universities, and all the various systems for training and developing the mind, might be applied without awakening in the heart the first symptom of Christianity. Education is the training of the mind, whereas Christianity is the awakening and spiritual training of the soul.

Mammoth Beneficence

THE United States is rapidly pushing to the front as a world-leader in public benefactions. According to data published by the Chicago Record-Herald, the total for last year of the numerous benefactions for educational, philanthropic and charitable purposes, reached the enormous figure of $150,000,000.

Surely, when the wealthy men and women of the country are employing their property to such excellent purpose, and sending back the riches they have accumulated into channels where it will do the largest amount of public service, and will confer the greatest benefits, it cannot be said that they are unappreciative of their responsibilities and opportunities as stewards of their talents. Indeed, with not a few of them, giving has become a passion, and it is noteworthy that their benefactions are selected and regulated with a view, not to self-gratification, but to securing the best results to the largest number.

Among the gifts of the year, several stand out boldly, both by reason of their phenomenal size and of the real benefits they are certain to produce in various fields. Mr. Rockefeller's gift of $30,000,000 to the General Educational Board, for the promotion of higher education, leads the list of large benefactions, and has been supplemented by other donations to the Chicago University and the Institute for Medical Research in New York. The latter is a direct benefit to poor patients. Mr. Widener, of Philadelphia, Mr. Crayton, of Omaha, Mr. Proctor, of Peoria, Mrs. Russell Sage, Miss Jeanes and Mr. Carnegie are also among the great donors to social services, negro education, art, hospitals, libraries, asylums and general charities.

It is certainly a most hopeful and encouraging sign that every passing year should witness, as it does, an increase in the number and amount of these princely benefactions. There can be no better use for wealth than this. The men or women who, having amassed a fortune in business or by judicious investments, recognize that their wealth has come from the people and the land, and who, therefore, conscientiously believe it a duty to return a portion of it for the benefit of those who have been less fortunate than themselves, are deserving of unstinted commendation.

It is evident that the Gospel, which teaches the sacred trusteeship of wealth, is producing its effect. Let us hope that it will increase, and that ultimately the heaven will spread, until the rich will everywhere understand that their wealth is not a personal possession, but that they will be held accountable for its proper use for the benefit of their fellow beings.

Native Missionaries

THIS year promises to be distinguished above its predecessors by a "forward movement" in foreign missions on very practical lines. Inquiries concerning the "personal substitute" plan of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, under which any one at home who is interested in foreign missions, can have his or her own personal substitute at the front, are steadily increasing. Many who have longed for years to go to the foreign field but who, through various causes, have been prevented, are now represented there by some trained Christian native—preacher, teacher, evangelist, Bible woman—who labors under the supervision of the white missionary and is in direct correspondence with the patron or supporter in this country.

To any one acquainted with the vastness of the missionary work in India, China and Africa, it must be evident that it is impossible for these countries to be evangelized by foreign workers alone. It is now admitted that the greater part of the work of evangelization must be done by the native Christians themselves. Every foreign missionary, man or woman, should have a staff of these trained and consecrated workers, not only as a matter of economy, but of efficiency. The cost of a native evangelist is from fifty dollars a year upward. In some few heathen lands it is lower; in others somewhat higher. It has become a most important part of the work of missionaries at the present time to train competent native workers of all grades, from the simple village evangelist or Bible reader, to those who are fitted to be leaders in the native church, as pastors and teachers.

As an illustration of the incomparable value of the "personal touch" in foreign missions, we may recall the orphanage work in India during the great famine of 1900. In one orphanage, where about five hundred children were kept and trained, thirty have been specially prepared and are now laboring as pastors and evangelists, spreading the Gospel among their kindred. Christian people here at home, when they took up the burden of personally supporting these orphans, did so out of pure kindness and sympathy, and had no thought that they were training those who, in God's wise providence, would some day become soul-winners.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Centre of the Mohammedan World

RECENT developments of photography have at last furnished the means of obtaining an actual photograph of a scene that has furnished a subject for pictures by many artists. The Mohammedan world holds Mecca, and especially the place of the Kaabah, in such veneration that no unbeliever has been permitted in the sacred enclosure, least of all an unbeliever carrying a camera. An adventurous photographer has now succeeded in getting a photograph which is reproduced on this page. It shows in the centre of the enclosure the huge cube, called the Kaabah, covered with its pall-like carpet, that contains the famous black stone which it is the ambition of every Mohammedan to kiss. An opening provided in the carpet discloses the sacred stone, before which a file of believers passes continually, imprinting on its surface reverential kisses. The stone is believed to be an aerolite that in ancient times fell to the earth. The Mohammedan tradition about it is that it was let down from heaven about two hundred years after Adam's fall, when he became repentant, and petitioned that some sign of divine forgiveness be vouchsafed to him. The tradition goes on to say that this gift of heaven was carefully preserved, and finally came into the possession of Abraham, who, assisted by his son Ishmael, reared the shrine in which the stone from heaven was deposited. It is bordered by a large plate of silver about a foot broad. That it is very ancient is certain. Mohammed himself assisted in A.D. 605 in placing it in its present position, and it was regarded as an antiquity at that time.

Mecca itself, as the birthplace of Mohammed, is to his followers the centre of the Mohammedan world. It is a city of about fifty thousand permanent residents, but the pilgrims who visit it are seldom less than a hundred thousand. It is situated in a narrow valley in Arabia, about seventy miles east of Jedda, the chief port of the country. The pilgrim walks seven times around the Kaabah, in turn with other pilgrims, of whom there are some thirty-five thousand in the sacred enclosure. He also is believed to acquire merit by running seven times between the two mountains Safa and Merwa, and by praying on Mount Arafat, which was Mohammed's favorite place of prayer. Having done this, he is entitled to wear a green turban to the end of his life. Never was a prophet revered as Mohammed is by his followers, nor one whose commands are more implicitly obeyed. In this, they set an example to the followers of Christ, who now, as in the days of his sojourn on earth, too often deserve the reproach he uttered:

Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say? (Luke 6:46.)

To Retard Old Age

In a medical journal of New York an article has appeared by Dr. Samuel G. Tracy, which has attracted wide attention. It is on the approach of old age. The doctor contends that senility is not in every instance due to the passage of years. The characteristics of the trouble, which he says shows itself first in the hardening of the arteries, sometimes appear in middle age and occasionally in youth. A man may be comparatively young in years, but if he has the hardened arteries, which result in high blood pressure, he is really old, and may die the death of extreme senility. It is important, therefore, to avoid habits which tend to produce the conditions. These, Dr. Tracy says, are chiefly over-eating or excessive drinking of alcohol. These habits cause more waste than repair, and the organs which preside over elimination of waste material being overtaxed, are unable to efficiently take care of the excess, and consequently some waste material floats in the blood stream, vitiating the "rivers of life" and degenerating the "river beds" or arteries. He believes that, with care in diet and exercise, old age may be retarded or at least that no man need become old before his time. To this may be added, without offense to the eminent physician, an ancient prescription given by a layman, under whose treatment the life of a distinguished patient was lengthened fifteen years. This was, trust in God and activity in his service, thus avoiding worry and foreboding, the chief foes of long life.

They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary; they shall walk and not faint. (Isa. 40:31.)

A Belated Visitor

A family in New York went down to the docks last week to meet a friend who had accepted their invitation to spend Christmas with them. She lives at La Paz, Bolivia, and in order to reach her friends here on time, she left her home early in November. But November passed and all December and still she did not appear. Then January drifted away without her arrival. Not until near the middle of February did any tidings of her come to hand. She was then on her way from Europe. The vessel on which she sailed from Mollendo, her home port, after rounding the Horn, reached Montevideo and thence proceeded northwards. A few days later the steamer Sevilla collided with her and damaged vegetables. After dinner the prisoners were compelled to take off their citizens' clothes and don the prison uniform of jean trousers, hickory shirt, gray coat and government shoes. They were locked up in their cells for thirty minutes while the guards ate their dinners. The men of the party were then ordered out to cut ice. There was a party of friends to meet the judge when he emerged at the end of his sentence. "It was as hard a day's work as I ever did," he said, "and I shall know now what a sentence to the workhouse implies." His method of gaining knowledge must have been a painful one, but it is the only one by which some kinds of knowledge can be attained. It was thus that Jesus was qualified to become a Saviour to his people.

It behooved him to be made like unto his brethren . . . for in that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted. (Heb. 2:17, 18.)

A Dog's Long Journey

A marvelous instance of a dog's sagacity is reported by a citizen of Oakland, Calif. He had a greyhound that became a favorite with him. Early in last December it attracted the notice of a friend, to whom he eventually sold it. His friend took the dog to his home in Western Montana, but it was discontented and restless. One day the dog was missing, and though search was made, no trace of it could be found. Last week its former owner saw a mud-covered and footsore dog outside his house. He was about to drive it away, when it gave an eager bark and leaped joyously around him. He recognized the dog he had sold to his friend and admitted it to the house, where it lay down apparently overcome by fatigue. The animal, guided only by canine instinct, must have traveled fifteen hundred miles to reach its former home. The incident gives new point to the reproach God brings against his people that their fidelity is inferior to that of the lower animals:

The ox knoweth his owner and the ass his master's crib; but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider. (Isa. 1:3.)

Burglars in Church

Three youthful burglars were arraigned in a Brooklyn court recently. The age of the youngest criminal was only thirteen, while the eldest had not attained his twentieth year. The charge against them was that of robbing a church. A citizen returning to his home in the early morning hours noticed that the windows of a church were bright, as if the building was lighted up. Knowing there was no service there at that hour, he called up the sexton on the telephone. Securing the help of a policeman they entered the church and found that a bonfire had been made of Bibles and hymn-books, which was making rapid headway. The blaze was extinguished by the aid of the fire department and then an investigation was made as to the cause. It was found that lead pipes in various parts of the church had been stolen, and several faucets had been cut off and removed. Inquiries led to the arrest of the three boys, one of whom confessed that he and his companions had broken into the church and stolen the metal and had then made the fire, believing that if the church was burned the theft would not be discovered. They were heedless of the mischief they might do in taking this foolish method of trying to conceal their crime. It was significant, too, that they used Bibles for fuel. Their act was like that of men who would get rid by any means of the book which arraigns and indicts them of their evil deeds. Many wicked men have burned the Bible with the same motive, since that day when the wicked king mutilated it and burned it in his palace rather than listen to its warning.

He cut it with the penknife and cast it into the fire that was on the hearth, until all the roll was consumed. (Jer. 36:23.)

her so seriously that she was beached. The lady waited in vain for a steamer to New York. There was one to England and she took that and she has now, after voyaging nearly four months, arrived at her destination. It was a long voyage, with vexatious delays, but has ended well after all. There are many whose journey of life is similarly filled with disappointments, who have not the prospect of that consolation which God gives to those who trust him.

Then are they glad, because they be quiet; so he bringeth them unto their desired haven. (Ps. 107:30.)

A Judge in a Workhouse

The sentence of one day in the workhouse was pronounced on himself by a police justice in his court in Toledo, O. The judge had told his friends that he wanted to know, by actual experience, what the criminals whom he sentenced to terms in the workhouse had to endure. His friends laughed at him and hinted that his tenderness of heart might interfere with his duties on the bench. The judge persisted, however, and sentenced himself. No difference was made in his treatment from that of the criminals in the court. He was locked up in the court pen with the others and was sent with them in the patrol wagon to the workhouse. On their arrival they were sent to the dining-room, where they ate the regular prison dinner of vegetable soup, meat and baked

HAPPY LITTLE ORPHANS AT SENDAI

ORPHANAGES were unknown in old Japan. When relatives were unable to provide for the little ones without father or mother or both parents, or when there were no near relatives at all, the lot of the orphan was hard indeed. Christians have seen the need and have established a number of orphanages. Until quite recently there were no orphanages in Japan except those controlled by Christians.

During the famine in North Japan two years ago, many orphans and other destitute children were found. On the night before Christmas, 1905, one of these famine children, a boy about ten years old, slept in the snow in a missionary's yard. The next day he was found, and from that Christmas Day he has been cared for. Application was made to the large Christian Orphanage at Okayama, but this boy could not be admitted, as he did not come within the regulations in force at that time; the regulations were later changed, however, and special arrangements made for the admission of more than eight hundred such children into that orphanage, which is now the fourth largest in the world.

As the famine grew more and more severe, more children were found. Early in February, 1906, ten children who could not be provided for in any other way were gathered together in a small rented house and put in charge of Miss Frances Phelps, a Methodist missionary, who came from Tokyo for this purpose. A few days later the ten had increased to a hundred, and as there was no orphanage in Japan north of Tokyo, it was decided to open one in Sendai at once. To provide for these children was a duty, but at first the labor of love was largely a work of faith. Soon our hearts were cheered by the receipt of one thousand dollars from a member of one of Rev. D. M. Stearns' Bible classes, and while the number of children was growing from 100 to 200 and then to 250, the gifts were pouring in.

Before the close of the relief work, the Foreign Committee of Relief was able to grant $12,500 of the sum it had received through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and thus make sure provision for the children for at least two years to come.

When the famine was over and the worst suffering at an end, very few of the children could be returned to their homes. There are 261 still being cared for. As the average age is only about ten years, they look to Christian benefactors for help for at least five years yet. The orphanage is in charge of a board of trustees, on which board six denominations are represented, and a board of ten directors, among whom are missionaries of four different denominations. The mayor of the city and other prominent citizens are also members of these boards.

In more ways than one, the famine proved to be a blessing to North Japan. As one expression of Christian love, this Christian orphanage was established in Sendai, the very centre of the famine district.

SOCIAL LIFE OF THE WASHINGTONS

WHEN Washington became President of the United States, both he and Lady Washington, as she was generally called, took naturally the chief place as the social leaders of the new-born nation. It was still a stately age, an age of rich brocades, of powdered hair, of stiff and rustling silks, brought at great expense from over seas, an age which has been the delight of the historical painter and the writer. Everything, architecture, customs, and ways of living, furnished a fit setting for the two stately figures who have left an indelible impress on our history.

Washington was one of the tallest men of his time, extremely dignified, accustomed to command, and to the best social life of the colonies. His wife was a woman of fine presence, of quiet dignity, and with a full consciousness of all the demands of her position as the first lady of the land. While neither attempted an extravagant style of living, they both felt that they stood as the representatives of the nation to the outer world, and when they received distinguished foreigners and diplomats, their receptions, in both the temporary capitals of New York and Philadelphia, were ordered on much the same lines as court receptions abroad.

Sometimes, on great occasions, the President and Mrs. Washington received together, but both had separate levee days, when they received the people of the official world and also the gentry of the State.

Lady Washington received on Friday evenings. The guests came early and departed by nine. She was fifty-seven when she came to New York, and this is the age she appears in the picture of Lady Washington's Reception. The portrait by Robert Edge Pine was painted about this time. The one by Stuart, which is the most popular of her portraits, and has been reproduced so often, was painted about ten years later.

The Washingtons hired one of the best colonial houses in New York, and the gentry of the city crowded to her first "at home," if we give it the modern name. Footmen in the Washington livery stood at the curb to open the doors of the gaily painted coaches, while others stood in the hall and announced the names of the guests. Every one, on entering, advanced bowing to the head of the room, where the hostess stood dressed in brocade-flowered silk, her hair powdered and fastened with jeweled pins. After conversing a few moments, the guests would step to the right or left to make room for others, always, until some distance away, keeping the face turned partly in Lady Washington's direction. A brilliant assembly it was after the greater part of the company had arrived. There was Mrs. George Clinton, wife of the Governor of the State of New York; Lady Stirling, wife of the gallant patriot general, Lord Stirling, who, by his brilliant charges at the battle of Long Island, had won undying military fame; there was the stately Marchioness de Brehan and Lady Temple, the American-born wife of the British Minister to the United States; and Lady Catherine Duer and her sister, Lady Mary Watts, daughters of Lady Stirling; and Mrs. Gerry, the beautiful wife of the Senator from Massachusetts; Mrs. Van Rensselaer, wife of the Patron of Rensselaerwick; Mrs. Winthrop and Sophia Chew and many others, all in the wide-skirted costume of the day, variegated in color as the hues of the rainbow. They wore powder and patches and the hair dressed high in the way that gives such charm to the old colonial portraits that have come down to us.

The gentlemen who attended were no less brilliantly attired than the ladies, for the coat of funereal broadcloth with the ugly trousers had not come into vogue. They wore coats of blue, black, light brown, green or crimson velvet. Thomas Jefferson, it is recorded, had a strong liking for coats of scarlet velvet, and sky-blue knee-breeches. The small-clothes were of satin, white, black and brown being the favorite colors of the day. The knee-breeches buckled at the knee, most of the buckles being of precious metal and set with brilliants. White silk stockings were worn with low shoes garnished with gold or silver buckles. They wore their hair powdered and "clubbed" at the back. Most of them wore small silver-hilted court swords. The diplomats appeared in the heavily embroidered court costumes of their respective countries, while the officers of the little standing army appeared in their natty buff and blue. Gen. Knox, the Secretary of War, making an imposing figure.

Washington, at his wife's receptions, did not stand by her side, but mingled as a guest among the company, making it a rule to converse briefly with every one present before they left. On these occasions he wore a light-colored coat and fancy waistcoat, and black small-clothes, and appeared without a sword.

Refreshments of plum-cake, coffee and tea were always served under the direction of Fraunces, who had charge of the culinary department of the Washington household. When Mrs. Washington held an afternoon levee, a few of the guests were invited to remain to the family dinner, which was served by Fraunces, gorgeous in livery, and with his hair as thickly powdered as that of any of the guests.

At Washington's own levee, which occurred on Tuesday afternoons, the President dressed in "a black velvet coat and breeches, his hair in full dress, powdered and gathered behind in a silk bag, yellow gloves, and holding a cocked hat with a cockade on it, and the edge adorned with a black feather about an inch deep. He wore knee and shoe buckles, and a long sword with a finely wrought and polished steel hilt; the coat worn over the blade, the scabbard of polished leather."

William Sullivan, who attended many of these receptions, has left us a graphic pen picture of one of them. "At three o'clock, or at any time within a quarter of an hour afterward, the visitor was conducted to the dining-room, from which all seats had been removed for the time. On entering, he saw Washington, who stood always in front of the fireplace, with his face toward the door of entrance. The visitor was conducted to him, and he required to have the name so distinctly pronounced that he could hear it. He had the very uncommon faculty of associating a man's name and his personal appearance so durably in his memory as to be ab-him a second visit. He received his visitor with a dignified bow, while his hands were so disposed of as to indicate that the salutation was not to be accompanied with shaking hands. This ceremony never occurred in these visits, even with his most near friends, that no distinction might be made. As visitors came in, they formed in a circle around the room. At a quarter past three the door was closed and the circle formed for that day. He then began on the right, and spoke to each visitor, calling him by name and exchanging a few words with him. When he had completed his circuit, he resumed his first position, and the visitors approached him in succession, bowed and retired. By four o'clock the ceremony was over."

When Washington drove out it was in a magnificent carriage painted yellow, with gilt decorations, and with little cupids on the panels. On the centre of the door was the Washington coat of arms. Four cream-colored horses obeyed the guiding hand of the colored driver, who was dressed in livery of the Washington colors, trimmed with much gold braid. The picture given in this issue shows the coach as it appeared when brought out about fifty years after Washington's death.

Besides receptions, there were many formal dinners given by the President and his wife and other entertainments. While in New York both were fond of taking trips for a day or two over on to Long Island, through Flatbush, Hempstead and Flushing, or up the Hudson, into Westchester County, to be free for a time from the cares of their position. Both Washington and his wife were regular in their church attendance. They had a pew in old St. Paul's Episcopal Church which still stands on Broadway. Members of his staff usually accompanied the President to and from church. When they went to Philadelphia their social life continued on much the same lines as before. Even after Washington's retirement from the presidency a constant stream of visitors to Mount Vernon kept him in touch with all the States and with Europe. Here he led the life of a dignified country gentleman, but never losing interest in any part of the nation he had served so well.

IN THE DAYS OF WASHINGTON

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

ONE hundred and seventy-six years ago, in a farmhouse in Old Virginia, George Washington was born. Many other children no doubt were born on February 22, 1732, and grew up to meet whatever emergencies life had in store for them; but only one, the little son of a gentleman planter and his wife, the beautiful Mary Ball, was destined to fill a niche in the hall of fame. The boy came of sturdy English lineage, his people for generations having adorned their station in the mother land. His father early passing away, the boy was somewhat sternly brought up by a rigid but most affectionate mother. He had little learning except as he took advantage of the common school, but he was taught to ride, to shoot and to speak the truth, and received the training of a land surveyor. But for his attachment to his mother the boy at sixteen would have entered the British service as a midshipman, and in the struggles the Colonies were, yet to make for freedom from the exactions of Parliament they would probably have had no leader so strong and sagacious as Washington proved himself to be.

During his childhood he belonged to people entirely loyal to the mother country, but when in his young manhood, the issue had to be faced and the Declaration of Independence carried into actual practice Washington had no hesitation as to his course. Every school-boy and schoolgirl studying American history knows how important a figure Washington was through the stormy days of the Revolution. His benignant face with its look of Spartan firmness is in many a picture book in many a gallery and many a home. First in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen, his illustrious character has endured without spot the fiercest light of contemporary history, and in the story of the Republic it continues to stand in the front rank, the very type of heroism for our children to copy.

Washington's birthday is a legal holiday, ushered in with thunders of cannon, unfurling of flags and general rejoicing. Bands of music play national airs and soldiers parade on this day in memory of the man whom most of all Americans love and revere. Not only have such men as John Fiske and Woodrow Wilson written exhaustively in Washington's praise; he has captivated the imagination of those authors who dip their pens in morning dew and write with the dash and glamour of romance. Dr. S. Weir Mitchell and Owen Wister are among the latest to choose George Washington as a hero in their brilliant pages.

It seems a pity that more is not made at present of this peculiarly patriotic holiday, in the education of our children, especially as so vast a host of pupils in the public schools have not an American background. They should be told by teachers something of the achievements and distinctions of this brave and knightly gentleman who was contented to sink himself and place his country first; who cared nothing personally for emoluments, but risked everything that the land might be free; who, when his duties of first President of the new Republic were at an end, went back like Cincinnatus to his plow and the culture of his field. Mount Vernon, the home of Washington, is well worth a pilgrimage, and those who have stood within its doors and seen its unobtrusive relics have gained a new insight into the life that Washington led. His home life was simple and beautiful; his manners were dignified and stately; in public and private, as citizen, husband, friend, and pure-hearted gentleman, he was well-nigh perfect. North and South, East and West, from the Androscoggin to the Mississippi, from the Alleghenies to the Rockies, let our millions of people celebrate the praise of one who builded better than he knew when he helped to lay the foundations of our Union.

On the next two pages of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is presented a famous historical painting, "Lady Washington's Reception," by the celebrated artist, Huntington. Every figure in this great canvas is a portrait of some one well-known and prominent in the days of our First President, and consequently a familiar figure at the White House receptions. On this page is printed the key to the larger picture, by the use of which the portraits may be readily identified. It is a picture well worth preserving, both by reason of its high value as a work of art and also as an unequalled gallery of historical portraiture.

Shall Your Son Go to College?

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE question of the boy's future is a serious one with thoughtful parents. So much depends on his getting a good start, so much on his equipments for life and so much on his personality, that the decision as to his education may well be called momentous. A change has come over the minds of people in general in these days as to the value of a liberal education. For example, rather more than a score of years ago, a man of large means, who had several sons, gave a downright refusal to the plea of the eldest that he might go to college after his graduation from the high school of his town. The boy was clever, ambitious, a good student, and a fellow in every way to be trusted.

"I don't intend to have you ruined," said the father; "if you go to college you will get into indolent habits, loaf about with a crowd of idle young men and be utterly spoiled for business. If you are to succeed in business, you must begin at the bottom before you are any older."

There was no shaking the position taken by the father, who had himself risen from the ranks, was shrewd, successful, and sagacious, and the master of his own house. The son yielded, entered his father's office and put his ambition aside, so far as learning was concerned. A similar plan was pursued with the two boys next in order of age. When the youngest arrived at his turn he was allowed to go to the university of his choice, not only without a demur, but with his father's entire approbation, the father observing that he regretted having disappointed the other boys in their expressed wish.

The pendulum had swung the other way. The impression has constantly gained ground in recent years that college training develops a young man physically, intellectually and morally. There is hardly a doubt that he will be better able to bear the brunt of life after four years spent on equal terms among men drawn from every class and condition, and that the mental balance and poise acquired by systematic study will fit him to take up with greater success either mechanical, commercial or professional work. Present standards are exacting, and thorough training is necessary for the man who is to be successful. Many parents are coming to see this as the parent did whose case I have used as an illustration. His youngest boy stepped almost at once after his graduation into a situation equal in importance and financial return to those which his brothers had reached by a slower climb.

As a stepping-stone to any learned profession, a college training is essential. A man is a better lawyer, an abler physician, a better minister of the Gospel for the college training that precedes the professional school. In journalism, it is admitted on every hand, and particularly in the offices of the great city newspapers, that the young man from Yale, Harvard, Princeton or any other well-known college or university, has a chance of success superior to that of his friend who has not had his advantages.

If a man is to be a chemist, a civil engineer, an electrician, if he is to enter forestry or take hold in any way of the world's work in one of its new phases, the preparation a college will give him cannot be reckoned in dollars and cents. It is indeed almost indispensable.

Beware of sending your son to college simply for the reason that it may gild refined gold, give him greater polish of manner and a higher social standing. These incidentals are well enough in their way, but the real reason for the step must lie in the capacity, talents, and, above all, in the earnest and steadfast wish of the boy himself. Unless there is stuff in a man, outside ad-

THE SCHOOL NURSE

AMONG the most beneficent of modern charities we may mention the happy thought that first sent a visiting nurse into the homes of the poor. Many churches and schools now employ a trained nurse with an annual salary, to go wherever she is needed into homes of want and suffering. When children are reported as absent from school through illness, the nurse at once goes to see them, and her entrance is like that of an angel. Many a little life is saved by the skill and tender ministry of a visiting nurse.

advantages will count for nothing. Be chary, too, of sacrificing your girls or your younger children to a favored son. It sometimes occurs that a whole family suffers because too much is done for one of its members. On the boy's part, when means are limited, there ought to be the disposition to help himself. College vacations are long, and there are numerous ways in which a student may earn money during the summer months. Do not decide against college on account of an outward prejudice that a boy is better for having the minimum of educational advantages in the period of preparation for life.

I hope that only a small minority of readers share the opinion that college is a place for idleness and loafing. On the whole, the man who can go to college is much more fortunate than the man who must gain culture from other sources.

A Word to Mothers

WERE mothers to put themselves in the place of the little people who look up to them with eager eyes, asking if they may do this or that, go here or there, play with that child or visit the other, they would not so often say no when they might as well say yes. The little monosyllable is easily spoken, and often it is the right one; but a no that might be a yes inflicts a disappointment on a little heart and brings clouds to a sky that should be sunny. Every little child is entitled to just as much happiness as can be crowded into the hours between rising in the morning and going to bed at night. Of course no must be said when children would get into danger, hurt themselves or their playmates, or do something wrong. To yield to a child's wishes when it would mean injury to the child, is weak and foolish; but far too often busy mothers utter a thoughtless no, and go on with their work or their conversation entirely oblivious of the discourtesy they have shown to a child. A little child should be treated with as much consideration as anybody else—almost indeed with more consideration than a grown person, because the latter can defend himself, while the little one is obliged to submit and do as he or she is told.

In nursery discipline there should be gentleness and firmness united. Harshness and injustice are as intolerable there as in other environments, and they do more harm in the nursery than in the drawing-room, because the impressions made on little children are made for all the years to come. Wax to receive and marble to retain is the rule about impressions that are made on children during the first seven years of life. Say no when you must, and yes when you can, when the children run to you with an innocent plea.

The Duty of Cheerfulness

To look on the bright side and to look for the bright side are positive duties. Nobody has a right to sulk perversely, or to make a merit of depression. When people are constantly melancholy a physician should be sent for and an effort made to get at the cause of the malady. Melancholia is a disease to be dreaded and fought as Christian fought Apollyon. Usually it is due to a physical condition that may be squarely met and ultimately vanquished. These remarks do not apply to the deep sorrow that follows in the wake of bereavement, yet even this has its relief in acknowledging God's will, and in looking beyond this world to the sweetness and peace of the next. Let us be bright and brave and cheery. When we feel a little low in our minds, let us put on our outdoor things and go for a walk, or if we cannot do that, let us sit in the sunshine, and so far as we may keep our blues to ourselves, and try to speak to our friends as if everything around wore the hue of the rose. A brave endeavor to look and speak cheerfully often results in routing depression and bringing back the happier mood.

Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, in his Eloquent Introduction to this Superb Edition, says:

"The first book I can remember, next to the Bible, is Pilgrim's Progress. It was read aloud to me by my mother on Sunday afternoons, when I was eight years old. The vivid impression made on my mind by that reading will never be effaced. The characters of the story were as real to me as my own schoolmates. My own father was not more clearly an actual being than Christian or Faithful.

"This reality of the allegory has been an abiding one, and it is safe to say that this is one of the characteristics of the story which make it immortal. The characters, the incidents, the outcome are real in the story because they are real in actual life. Based, as it is, on Bible teaching and human experience together, Pilgrim's Progress is immortal, as indeed all things are immortal which are true.

Questions and Answers

Reader, Fulton, Del. 1. In the case of those who come to the Bowery Mission, are they from the sick or poor? 2. Which is the greater cause of evil, poverty or riches?

1. They are from all classes, and include some who once were prosperous, and not a few who have had the advantages of good homes and superior education, but who have gone wrong and are now striving to get right again. The majority are probably unfortunates who, through long lack of employment, dissipation or misfortune, have lost their hold. 2. Poverty, as seen in a great city, with all its hard and merciless accompaniments—cold, sickness, hunger, exposure and inability to provide for loved ones—is an evil so obvious that it admits of no question. Riches, wrongfully amassed, and used to gratify indulgence, is also a prolific source of evil. The only thing for us to do is to relieve the suffering nearest at hand, without too much questioning as to its source.

H. M. Lawrence, Mich. What is the meaning of the phrase (John 2:17): "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up?"

The disciples were doubtless surprised at the courage of One whom they had regarded as so meek and gentle, setting himself to a task from which the bravest might have shrunk. It was a new side to their Master's character, but thinking it over, they realized that it was one that the prophets had predicted of him. His indignation at seeing the house that had been dedicated to God so prostituted made him regardless of his own safety. It absorbed him, or as John says, "ate him up"—made him forget everything else.

Mrs. M. P., Newtown, Ind. When was the Christian Campbellite Church organized? What church did Alexander Campbell come from?

He was originally a Presbyterian. In 1812 he began to preach a new form of doctrine in regard to baptism, and in 1827 his followers began to organize as a separate body, which afterwards spread in all parts of the United States.

E. A. H., Enfield, N. H. Was Daniel alive when Jerusalem was destroyed?

So far as can be learned from his own book, he was then a man about thirty years old and was living in Babylon. He tells us that he was carried a prisoner to Babylon "in the third year of King Jehoiakim." (See Daniel 1: 1.) This would be about 604 B.C., and it is supposed he was then about twelve years old. Jerusalem was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar and the Temple burned in the year 586 B.C. We do not know how long Daniel lived after this, but his own book shows (Daniel 10: 1-4) that he was still in Assyria, and was living on the banks of the Tigris, in the third year of King Cyrus, which would be about 535 B.C. He would then, according to the above estimate, be nearly eighty years old, which would account for his not returning with the other exiles when the decree of Cyrus was issued, permitting the rebuilding of the city.

H. F. C., Comer, Ga. 1. How many republican governments are there in the world, and which is the oldest? 2. When Alexander the Great was out on his Western Asian invasion, he pillaged all of the towns that he came to; but when he got to Babylon, she voluntarily opened her gates to him, and he went in, made friends with them, and repaired the damages done by other invaders. Why did he favor Babylon, and destroy all other places?

1. There are twenty-two. Probably the oldest republic is the little independent State of San Marino, which has existed since early in the middle ages. It is situated on an eastern spur of the Apennines, in Italy, and has an area of thirty-three square miles. The population is 11,000. It is governed by a council of sixty members, two of whom are appointed every six months to act as regents. There is a council of twelve. It has its aristocracy and an order of knighthood. The army numbers 950 men and 38 officers. A new treaty with Italy was signed at Florence in 1897. 2. Because Babylon, in all its glory, as a subject city would add to his own prestige. He pillaged those cities which opposed him. He was conquering the world, and if a city submitted without resistance it was to his advantage, thus saving his army for the rest of his campaign.

L. M. F., Walkerville, Mich. Why does Paul in Acts 16: 37 boast of being a Roman, while in other places, as in Acts 21: 39, he claims to be a Jew?

The Romans conferred citizenship as a great honor on people of other lands in reward for some distinguished service. This citizenship descended to their children. It is probable that Paul's father or grandfather had won citizenship in this way. Many Jews in our day have American citizenship by birth or naturalization, and are Americans as well as Jews.

C. A., Rogersville, Ala. 1. What is the origin of the word honeymoon? 2. What is the meaning of LL. following D.D.? 3. What is the meaning of Esperanto as a language?

1. It comes from the old Teutonic custom of drinking diluted honey for a moon's age, or thirty days, after a wedding. 2. LL.D. stands for Doctor of Laws; when used with D.D., it means that the person using it after his name has received both honorary degrees. 3. Esperanto comes from a word meaning "hope." The history of the Esperanto language has been given in recent issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

S. T. C., Bay, Ark. 1. Have I, as a woman, been doing wrong in teaching in Sunday School as Paul says (1 Tim. 2: 12)? 2. Can we hope to be perfect as Christ commands (Matt. 5: 48)?

1. By no means. If you had lived in those countries and those times, you might have considered the question. Women were despised then and there and for them to have taken a prominent part in Christian worship would have brought discredit on the new religion and injury on their own character. Even Paul shared the prejudices of his time, but doubtless had no intention of making his prohibition permanent. Nothing can be more certain than that he would rejoice if he knew how useful women have been in the church since his day and how God has blessed them. 2. The traveler, looking up to the summit of the mountain, asks: "Can I ever climb it?" The traveler who is wise and has faith, makes the start and does the utmost in his power, trusting that he will receive help.

Miss Arbella Saddlemire, Knox, N. Y., a reader of this journal, makes the following novel suggestion, which may prove interesting to those who are studying social problems:

The best way to stop the flood of poor people is for the legislature to pass a strict law that no man shall marry till he has at least $2,000 at interest and until he is twenty-five or thirty years old and in a position to keep a family; and no girl till she is twenty-three or twenty-five and has things to keep house with. This law, once put in force, would make a better people and wipe out the slums in our cities.

We should be pleased to have other readers express their views of this correspondent's suggestion.

E. J., Anita, Ia. Please explain Isa. 65: 20-25. What is the meaning of the wolf and the lamb feeding together?

It is a description of the Millennium, the thousand years at the end of this dispensation, when Christ and his principles shall be supreme throughout the world. The peace and harmony that will then ensue, Isaiah says, will extend to the brute creation.

Mrs. Rena Eberhart, Ada, O., sends this interesting information:

The picture on the one-cent coin is the profile of Mrs. Sarah Longacre Keen, taken when she was six years of age. Her father was an engraver at the mint, Philadelphia, when some Indians visited the mint. They were invited home by the father and the Indians took a fancy to the girl, on whom a chief put his head-dress, when a profile was made. This was afterward entered in competition for a prize profile for the one-cent coin, then about to be made. It won first prize and has since been used. My father's name was Isaac Longacre, and the original of the picture on the one-cent coin is one of his ancestors.

B. C. B., Richmond, N. H. In which of the four Gospels do we find the most accurate life of Christ?

None of them is an accurate life of Christ, nor does it profess to be such. As John tells us (John 20: 30, 31), they were not written for that purpose. They were written that men might believe on Christ, and that believing, they might live. No biography could attain that end, however skillfully it was written. It is generally believed that Mark's Gospel appeared first. Then Matthew, thinking it was not adequate in showing to Jews that Christ was the Son of David and fulfilled the prophecies, prepared his Gospel specially for them, probably having Mark's Gospel before him. Luke had access to authentic documents and had a genius for compiling. He, as he tells us (Luke 1: 1-4), desired a more orderly story. Observing how many things Mark had omitted, he carefully prepared his work, having in mind the Gentiles, who had little interest in the matters that seemed so important to Matthew. Finally John, seeing that the others had concentrated their attention chiefly on what had taken place in northern Israel, wrote about the events in Jerusalem and the intimate teachings which he, more than any other disciple, had appreciated. So we get our fourfold view, each having its own special purpose and value.

SHELTER FOR THE HOMELESS POOR

New York, d. 30. Januar 1908.

(Ps. 122: 7, 8; Matth. 25: 40; Ebr. 6: 10.)

Geehrter Herr Dr. Klopsch!

Es wird einem schwer um's Herz, wenn man daran denken muß, wie die armen, arbeitslosen Männer in dieser großen Kälte des Nachts draußen herum wandern müssen. Jemand erzählte mir von einem jungen Mann, der nach Amerika kam; leider konnte er hier keine Arbeit finden, besonders schwer für ihn war es, daß er die englische Sprache nicht sprechen konnte. Er ging betteln, wußte aber nicht, wo er des Nachts schlafen sollte. So kam er Abends zu der Bowery Mission; wie dankbar war er, daß er dort heißen Kaffee bekam, doch leider war es nur bis 2 Uhr Nachts offen. So mußte der arme Mensch den Rest der Nacht auf der Straße bleiben. So ging es mehrere Tage, bis er zusammenbrach, dann brachte ihn ein Polizist nach dem Krankenhaus, wo er lange, schwer krank darnieder lag. Er wunderte sich, wie das nur sein kann, daß die vielen Kirchen und Missionen des Nachts leer und geschlossen dastehen, während die Obdachlosen auf der Straße umkommen.

Gott gebe, daß die Zeit sehr nahe ist, wo sich die Gerechten erbarmen über dieses Elend.

Einliegend mein Echerflein ($5), für die Obdachlosen.

Der Herr unser Gott segne Sie und Ihre Werke. Der Christian Herald ist ein herrliches Blatt, welches ich jede Woche mit Freuden erwarte. Eine Mitpilgerin nach Zion.

(TRANSLATION)

NEW YORK, January 30, 1908.

(Ps. 122: 7, 8; Matth. 25: 40; Heb. 6: 10.)

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: It makes one sad at heart to think of the poor, unemployed men who, in this terrible cold, are compelled to wander on the streets all night. Some one told me of a young man who came to America, but could find no work, because he could not speak the language. He went begging, but did not know where he could sleep at night. So he went to the Bowery Mission. How thankful he was to receive hot coffee there; but the Mission was only open till 2 o'clock, so this poor fellow had to walk the streets for the rest of the night. This he did several days, but he finally collapsed. Then a policeman took him to a hospital, where he was sick for a long time. He wondered how it could be that the many churches and missions were empty and locked at night, while the homeless perished on the streets. God grant that the time is not far distant when the righteous will have compassion on such misery.

Enclosed find my mite ($5) for these homeless ones. The Lord our God bless you and your work. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a glorious paper, which I await every week with pleasure.

A FELLOW-PILGRIM TOWARD ZION.

[THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in view of the severe winter and the widespread suffering, has adopted the excellent suggestion contained in this letter, and has opened a temporary Night Refuge in the Bowery Mission, to afford shelter to homeless and destitute men and boys until the hardest part of the winter is past. Besides this, our "Bread-Line," which formerly fed 1,000, has been doubled up, and now feeds 2,000 unemployed and friendless men and boys. A breakfast is served to those who are sheltered overnight, which gives them courage and strength to search for work. If even a few of the hundreds of churches in New York, which are kept locked up during the week, but with furnaces going, were to throw open their warm basements as shelters for the homeless poor, much misery would be averted and many a humble fellow-being, penniless and friendless, would be saved from death by freezing.]

HOW A LAD HELPED THE LORD

"COME ye apart and rest a while." It was not the devil but Christ who thus called good men to rest. We can obey Christ, we can keep with Christ, in rest as well as in work, in laughter as well as in tears. The apostles had been living strenuously (Matt. 10; 11: 1, 12, 13). They had healed many sick, and cast out devils and contended with devilish men who pretended to be angelic—the Pharisees. Returning from these tours of spiritual harvesting, they had found Christ in Capernaum busier yet. Crowds were passing through en route to the Passover at Jerusalem, and they were eager to hear the new prophet of Nazareth. "There were many coming and going, and they had no leisure so much as to eat." Friends of Christ said: "He is beside himself," because useful service was a greater joy to him than food. "My meat," he said, "is to do the will of him that sent me." But rest in its place is as sacred as work. God has put emphasis upon this truth, by setting apart a whole day in each week for rest from business and work.

Jesus Followed

But the ministerial vacation thus planned was interrupted. When Jesus retired with his apostles from the crowd, the people saw their boat was pointed toward Fishertown—such is the meaning of Bethsaida—and the crowd raced for it and got there first. Jesus saw the multitude scattered over the grassy plain and hillside there on the northeast shores of the Lake of Galilee, many of them clad in sheepskins, and they touched his heart as shepherdless sheep. He postponed his vacation, and resumed his teaching and his miracles. We may follow Christ in foregoing rest when some great opportunity for service presents itself. As evening drew on, Jesus saw in the excited crowd, who in their eagerness to hear him had also forgotten to eat, the signs of exhaustion. He had forgotten his own weariness, but he did not overlook the faintness of others. How un-Christlike was the medieval contempt of the body! How like Christ, the healer, is the ministry of the gymnasium and the missionary hospital and the Bowery Mission Bread-Line!

"Whence shall we buy bread that these may eat?" said Jesus, to test his disciples. As usual, they forgot he could work miracles, and so uttered an answer of folly. "Two hundred penny-worth of bread," said Philip, "would not supply so many with a morsel; and alas, the purse was as empty as the larder!" Andrew discovered a lad who had five loaves and two fishes. Sent on an errand, perhaps, he had followed the Friend of children. "What are they among so many?" said Andrew, as if his discovery of the boy was not worth telling. But is often important. How ashamed both Philip and Andrew presently were of their lack of faith! How ashamed we, too, ought to be, when we worry about to-morrow, forgetting how God saved us yesterday! Andrew did not count right. "Five loaves"—and Christ—that is abundance. David, with only five pebbles—"What are they against a giant's mail?" said the doubters. But five pebbles, plus God, was more than enough; just as five loaves—one loaf to each thousand men—and there were, no doubt, as many more women and children—was more than enough. Four pebbles were left over in David's bag, and there will be more left over than there was to start with in this feeding of the five thousand.

Our weakness is completeness in another's greater strength.

That lad with the few loaves and small fishes pictures the habitual attitude of great but modest men. David sang, when hosts were shouting the praises of his victory over Goliath, at an age when young men are usually wiser in their own eyes than ever after, "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast thou perfected praise." Solomon, at the age of nineteen, and a king, said: "I am but a little child." So Sir Isaac Newton, with the world praising his wisdom, described himself as a child wading in the shallows near the shore, while the great ocean of truth stretched far beyond him. These and such modest men succeeded because they brought to God in consecration what they regarded as their small, poor talents. The first secret of success is a deep sense of the insufficiency of human resources. "When I am weak, then am I strong." First, distrust of self; then trust in God. "I can do all things through him that strengtheneth me."

Do thy poor best, and reck not how or why,
Lest seeing all around thee spread
A mighty crowd and wonderfully fed,
Thy heart burst out into a bitter cry:
"I might have furnished, I, even I,
The two small fishes and the barley bread."

"Bring them hither to me." That is the secret of multiplying our talents—consecration. Talents, as well as loaves, multiply at the touch of Christ. A divine enthusiasm has done more for the world with small talents than great talents untouched with divine fire. "What is that in thine hand, Moses?" He answers, "It is only the stick that I cut in the mountains for a cane and a club." But God made it mightier than any sword or sceptre. So Shamgar's ox-goad, touched by God, was mightier than the polished spears of his many foes. And even a donkey's jawbone in Samson's hand, plus a divine enthusiasm, proved mightier than a thousand bows and swords of the Philistines. Dorcas could only bring to God her needle, but what a talisman of charity it has been for centuries! "What is that in thine hand?" "Only a worn Bible, the only book I know," said Mr. Moody. But God made his plain Bible talks mightier than the most learned sermons. Consecrated to Christ and blessed by Christ, that little pen in your hand may right many a wrong, may calling the apostles to do the human part; for we have no right to ask God in prayer to do anything we can do. To do so would be to substitute laziness for faith.

By this time we should all know enough of the peculiarities of these apostles to see just how each does his part in this successful effort to "reach the masses." Peter comes first, of course, not because he was above the others in rank, for he never was, but because he was the most enthusiastic of them all. We can see him eagerly receiving in his hands the loaves Christ first held out, and with his love of the old prophets whom he so much resembled, we hear him saying as he hurries from group to group, "This is the fulfilment of the prophet's promise, 'He shall feed his flock like a shepherd.'" Stately James, to whom all but Peter naturally defer, comes next and goes about more slowly, careful that not one shall be overlooked, and, with his temperamental admiration of the Mosaic law, he is reminding all about him that the same divine power is being manifested as fed their fathers with manna in the wilderness.

Apostolic Characteristics

Next come Andrew and Philip together, eager to get to work and atone for their faithless remarks. Then comes Matthew, the systematic business man who has consecrated his mathematics and is adding up miracles in one column and parables in another, to prove Christ's deeds and words are a fulfilment of the prophecies of the Messiah. He goes about in a systematic way, giving the mathematics of the miracle with the food. Then John comes forward, slowly and thoughtfully, receiving the loaves in his hands almost unconsciously, for he is looking through the face of Christ into his divine soul. He turns away to minister lovingly to the people, especially the "little children," reminding all that the same divine love is daily shown in the miracle of every meal. Last of all comes Thomas, looking right and left to see if there is any mistake about the miracle, and pressing the loaves to see if they be real, to make sure he is not in a dream.

The meaning of this whole scene is that God has a use for every variety of talent, not alone in the church but in the hills and by the lakes and in the fields. He can use not only enthusiasm and love, but even honest doubt. Every one of that Church of twelve was a "Christian at work." What a curiosity such a church would be to-day!

"They did all eat and were filled." It was nothing new that God should wonderfully feed the people. It was equally wonderful when he said to Adam at the world's beginning, "See, I have given you every herb bearing seed which is upon the face of the earth; and every tree in which is the fruit of a tree; to you it shall be for meat." And let us recall how God fed three millions of Israelites miraculously with manna and flesh in the wilderness for forty years, and provided water from the rock, in spite of their ingratitude and disobedience. Often God came near to Elijah in supplies of food, feeding him by ravens, multiplying for his sake the widow's meal and oil, and again, when hunger had made him a coward, God sent him meat by an angel, in the strength of which he went back to face Jezebel. Then in the story of Jesus we find not only the feeding of five thousand at this time, but of four thousand at another. No less divine is the daily feeding of the world's fourteen millions of people. If there were nothing else to prove an overruling Providence, it would be proved sufficiently by the correspondence between the bodily needs of men and their abundant supply in nature. Whenever this lesson recurs, the dialogue is appropriate of the teacher and child: "Who gives you bread?" "Mother." "And who gives it to mother?" "The baker." "And who to the baker?" "The miller." "And who to the miller?" "The farmer." "And who to the farmer?" "The ground." "And who gives it to the ground?" "God." How all the ages and all the world are represented at a dinner table! Many of our best vegetables God created as bitter roots, and man has worked with God to enlarge and sweeten them. And the foods and spices and furnishings on our tables come from all the continents—American flour, spices of India, British cutlery. Surely we should always come to the table to worship as the ancients came, making it an altar.

win many a soul. That boy of yours—are you solicitous for his future? Jesus says, "Bring him to me." No boy or girl, however safeguarded, is safe until he is saved. We must create the most favorable possible environment for growth in grace, but, however envired, a thorn will not grow into a vine. There must be a new nature. "Bring him to me."

Varied Talents Used

"He gave to the disciples to set before them." Here is another great encouragement, that Jesus could use such a variety of talents, small and great, as was found among his twelve apostles. Let us see a word picture of the miracle. "There was much grass in the place." This is our background, a grassy plain, with green slopes rising from it on three sides, and "blue Galilee" in front. The people had been scattered like sheep, but as "order is heaven's first law," Jesus bade the apostles arrange them in orderly groups of fifty and one hundred. Sitting cross-legged on the grass, with aisles about each group, their many-colored garments and Oriental enthusiasm of motion and conversation make them seem like a flower garden, and Peter so described them in telling the story to Mark. "They sat down by 'flower beds,' in fifties and hundreds." Jesus, the Gardener, was about to refresh these faded flowers and make them bloom with joy and wonder.

The people having been arranged, Jesus blessed the loaves and fishes of the lad who no doubt stood by rejoicing to be of some service to one who had been the Boy of boys, and was now the Man of men. Where the miracle of multiplication occurred we do not know, but the word "gave" being in the imperfect tense, indicating continued action, suggests that it was when the loaves were in his hands. "Give ye them to eat," Jesus said,

The Mischief-Makers

CHAPTER XVII THE PROBLEM SOLVED

THE next Sunday afternoon, Glenn Fraser went to make a call upon Miss Tilly Walker. He always went to her with anything that deeply concerned or interested him. She had petted and scolded him from his babyhood, and in the years since his mother died, he had gone to her for advice on every subject, from that of the most becoming color for a necktie, to the latest development in his latest love affair, and had never failed to get the help he desired.

"Wasn't that a fine sermon this morning?" he said. "I wanted to shout 'glory hallelujah' at first, but do you know, before Mr. Allan got half way through, I forgot all about my hallelujahs. It got too solemn for anything so joyful as they would have been."

"Yes," Miss Tilly answered, "it was by far the best sermon that Mr. Allan has preached here, and it contained much that I am sure will help every one who heard it. I know it hit me very hard, before he got through."

"Here, too," ejaculated Glenn. "When he read that fifty-first Psalm, I said to myself, 'How many of us could find that confession appropriate?' It touched me, and I looked around to see if Hollis Hayward had the same feeling; but bless you! she had one of the new singing books and was looking through it with the greatest indifference. Then, when Mr. Allan went on with that wonderful sermon about the different kinds of sinners there are in the world and in the church, and showed the injury that is done to churches and the cause of Christ by professing Christians, I wanted to throw my singing-book to the ceiling and shout, 'Hallelujah!' Why, he couldn't have found any name that would have described that clique better, for ever since I can remember, their sole aim has been to try to oppose the good things that other people were trying to do, simply because it was other people than themselves who were trying to do them. They are always and forever going around upsetting things. Sometimes I have thought that it was a pity that God didn't make their share of the world upside down to start with, so that by the time they got through with it, everything would be right side up with care."

Miss Tilly laughed. "I am afraid the world would be a sorry place for a good many people, if it were made according to your notions."

"Well, wouldn't that be fair? They make a sorry place of it anyway, so where are the odds?"

"I tell you, though," he went on, "I did enjoy that sermon hugely, so long as he was portraying the conduct of that crowd so faithfully that you could see them wince. It was good to see Hollis and Dora Murray and all their friends writhing under the lash and not able to answer back. I tell you I enjoyed it, until my turn came."

"I think Mr. Allan might have spared me, for I have been a useful friend to him, but I knew whom he was driving at when he began to talk of people that made it their delight to stir up other people's bad tempers and evil dispositions and fiery tongues, causing the poor unfortunates to disclose their own characters, and break their good resolutions, and abandon their efforts to do right; and then I said to myself, 'Glenn Fraser, maybe that don't fit Hollis—at least the stirring part of it. It appears to me that I have met a chap of that description, and if I remember right, he's just about your size.'"

"Well, I didn't look at Hollis any more. I was afraid she'd be looking at me. I felt my face flush and I looked down for fear every one would know who was being flayed. It seemed to me, before he had done with my case, that I was about the worst sinner in the crowd, I was so busy thinking about it, that I missed a good piece of the sermon. When I came to myself, he'd got around to those peacemakers who take the sting out of words, and the evil tendencies out of minds, and the jealousies out of hearts, by their gentle ways and wise words; and I pretty near shouted out loud: 'That's Aunt Tilly and Kathleen Lawrence.'"

"Why, Glenn," exclaimed his attentive listener, "it is a good thing that you had sense enough to keep still."

"If I had said it, I'll venture to say there'd have been a whole chorus of Amens!" retorted the young man. "Now I've fessed up, it's your turn. What was it that hit you?"

"I am afraid I am one of those he described when he spoke of those who are silent when they should speak, and who try to say pleasant things, when, if they had more courage, they would utter words of truth and warning; and who 'pass by on the other side,' leaving the victim to be deluded and the erring ones to go on in their wickedness and do more harm. I could not help but feel that I had treated Mr. Allan that way, and so had destroyed some of his usefulness and power."

Glenn drew a long breath. "Thank goodness! I don't have to reproach myself for having ever kept still when there was a chance to speak," he said.

Miss Tilly laughed. "No," she replied, "your tongue has never had a chance to rust from lack of use. Be careful that you do not whet it upon other people's tempers so much as to wear its edges sharp."

Silence fell between them for a little while, as their thoughts went over the stirring words to which they had listened.

"Surely the Lord was in that message to-day," Miss Tilly said. "If he was, and every heart in the congregation was touched as ours were, we will soon have the greatest revival that Hawthorne has ever seen."

"God grant it, for we need it," the young man replied with fervor.

Miss Walker's prediction came true. For many days the sermon of that Lord's Day was the leading theme for thought and for conversation in the whole community. The burning words of the preacher, born of his own great awakening, kindled a fire of repentance and brotherly kindness in many a heart, and warmed the pulses of the church with a zeal which made itself felt. The long-delayed revival came with blessed power, purging, purifying, revivifying the Hawthorne church, erasing old grievances, wiping out old scores, destroying the walls of division that had so long separated those who had been nominal Christians, and placing the people upon a new and delightful standing of cordiality and Christian sympathy.

When the news of the revival and its results came to the ears of the Rev. Homer Grant, he said:

"Joshua has prevailed again. Allan has proved his right to the title, and his faith has been justified. It was indeed the Lord that sent him to Hawthorne. Now we may expect great things from that church."

One beautiful evening, six months later, Glenn Fraser and Hollis Hayward rode swiftly along the road that led from the bridge to town. They were talking eagerly of the wedding which they had attended that evening, a double marriage, which had changed Mabel Lawrence to Mrs. Charlie Lester, and Kathleen Lawrence to Mrs. Edgar Allan.

"Wasn't it lovely?" Hollis exclaimed. "I do not think I ever saw two couples better suited to one another. Kathleen will make a perfect minister's wife, and I am sure all Hawthorne will agree with me when I say so. I am glad that she will not have to leave us, for we have all learned to appreciate her true worth—"

We Pay $2.10

We could buy beans as low as 30 cents per bushel. Yet we pay $2.10. We could buy tomato sauce for just one-fifth what we spend to make it.

We buy Michigan beans, because a certain soil there, rich in nitrogen, produces the best beans grown.

The choicest part of the crop is picked over by hand, to give us only the whitest, the plumpest, the fullest grown.

That's why we pay $2.10.

BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE
PORK AND BEANS

Cheap tomato sauce can be made from skin and cuttings—scraps from a canning factory. It lacks richness.

Else it is made from tomatoes picked green and ripened in shipment. Such sauce is flat.

Our tomatoes are grown close to our kitchen and ripened on the vines. The juice fairly sparkles.

We could buy tomato juice as low as 10 cents per barrel. Yet we pay $3.45 for just the tomatoes used in a barrel of ours.

That is why Van Camp's Pork and Beans have that superlative zest, that flavor, that blend. There is no other brand that compares with them. They have the largest sale in the world.

You can't begin to cook beans as we cook them. You lack the facilities. Let us cook for you.

One must bake beans as we bake them—in 245 degrees heat—else they are not mealy, not digestible.

They must be baked in live steam—not in dry heat—else the top beans scorch before the others are even half baked.

They must be baked without breaking, else they are not nutty. They must be baked with the tomato sauce, else you lose half their deliciousness.

You can't do these things, for you lack the facilities. The result is, you eat beans only occasionally. They should be a daily dish. You regard them as heavy food, simply because your oven heat is so insufficient that it fails to break down the fibre.

Beans, above all things, need to be factory cooked. Then they are Nature's choicest food—full 84 per cent nutriment. They are Prices: 10c, 15c and 20c per can. You can get them without the tomato sauce, if you prefer. At your grocers.

Persistent Prayer*

DIRECT encouragement is given by our Lord, both in the parable of the unjust judge and of the friend aroused at midnight, to persevering prayer. It is not an encouragement to irreverence or impudence, as many appear to think. There are some who enter the presence of God as a man goes to his debtor, with a note in his hand which he demands to have honored. There is a blustering air about them, as of one who reminds another of his duty, of his promise and obligation, and warns him that if he does not comply with the request, he will be false to himself. Nothing could be further from our Lord's principles than to suggest or encourage such an attitude. Neither would he have us think that we shall be heard for "our much speaking." By teaching and example he inculcated reverence and submission in our approaches to God.

Both the parables referred to give us the idea of some one who complies only when he is teased or worried. The judge complies lest he be wearied, and the friend because of the applicant's importunity. The inference, however, that Jesus himself drew from the incidents shows that his lesson was not that. It was that if the reluctant friend or the lazy judge was moved by importunity, how much more reason had we to hope that the loving heavenly Father would yield. We have all heard prayers that lacked this importunity. A series of petitions, uttered so often as to have lost all meaning, a mere parrot-like expression, that no one would expect would be answered. It is such prayers that Christ would have us avoid. The flinging down of requests and going away without thought, is a manner that never brought answer from man and will not from God. The petitioner must be in earnest if he would obtain the blessing, and he may be denied for a time to test his earnestness.

On the other hand, God does not yield to mere persistence. It would be bad for us if he did. He knows better than we what is good for us, and which, if any, of our requests it would be wise for him to grant. Persistence must never be so intense as to provoke him to do as he did to Israel, when "he gave them their request, but sent leanness into their souls."

Divine Leadership*

HOW sweet and consolatory are the few lines in which David compares himself to a sheep, and the Lord to his shepherd! The poem, short as it is, has been the comfort of faithful men in all times since it was written. It is evidently a reminiscence of that period of the Psalmist's life when he kept his father's sheep, and had had no experience of courts or battlefields. We can imagine the aged king harassed by enemies, distressed by his wilful children, full of forebodings of one kind and another, dwelling on that time of his shepherd life, and encouraging himself with the comparison of God's shepherding. How much he needed such care as he had given to his sheep! As the subject grows in his mind he sees that his experience justifies just such confidence.

God is really his shepherd; then he is sure that all his wants will be supplied. How can he want, when he is cared for by him who is Lord of the whole earth? In him he has love and care and bountiful provision. The need of his soul will be met as surely as the need of the body. His divine Shepherd has abundant resources of every kind, and there is no want of his nature, physical or spiritual, which he may not take to him in full assurance of its being met. There is more than that in the shepherding. His memory reminds him of his wandering, and he remembers how he has been led back again. The Shepherd has restored his soul, thereby doing more for him than the human shepherd could do for his sheep. And having restored him he leads him in the paths of righteousness. None knew better than David the need of such leading. He knew that he was unfit to direct his own life. His prayer was that God might lead.

The note of triumph grows as the future spreads before him. This divine Shepherd who has fed him and cared for him and restored his soul, will be with him in the dangers that lie before him. Even in the dark valley that he knows he must tread, he will be led by that protecting Hand. Even there he will not be alone, but will be accompanied and comforted. Goodness and mercy will follow him all his days, and in the end he will enter the Lord's house, to go out no more forever.

since the revival opened our blind eyes, and touched our foolish tongues."

"Yes," Glenn assented. "Mr. Allan rubbed out a great many things with that sermon. Like you, I am glad the church has called him to a permanent pastorate, and I am equally glad that he has secured a wife so worthy of him. As to their being better suited to one another than any other couple in this town, I beg leave to dissent. After all our bickerings, and pitched battles, and armed truces, you and I have come out on to a higher plane of living, and instead of fighting one another, have united to fight the battles of the Lord. That is a good partnership, but there is yet another one that I would like to make with you. You and I are only ordinary people, so we are liable to forget our good resolves, and to find ourselves in an interesting battle before we realize our danger; but I have thought of a means by which we may safeguard ourselves, if you will consent to it."

"That sounds interesting," laughed the girl as he paused. "If I were the same girl that I was six months ago, I would accept that as a challenge to mortal combat."

"But you are not the same girl—thank God! If you were, I would not say what I am going to say. Two people are necessary to make a quarrel. If you and I should become one, no quarrel would be possible. See?"

As the rest of their conversation was strictly private, we have nothing whatever to do with it.

There is romance in the fireplace and the lamp—not in the register and the gas jet.

MACBETH'S lamp-chimneys, of perfect Pearl Glass and perfect fit, make poor lamps useful and comfortable as well as poetic. They turn all of the oil into light—none of it into smoke, and give all of the light to you, instead of the ceiling. They never break from heat. The genuine have my name on them.

My Lamp-Chimney Catalogue is full of practical suggestions about lamps, chimneys, wicks, oils, and how to keep them in order. It tells which chimney will give the best light on every kind of lamp. It saves a great deal of bother and money. I gladly mail it, free, to anyone who writes for it.

Children, whose pupils gave an entertainment for the men of the Bowery Mission a few weeks ago. Unlike some who are connected with charitable organizations, Mrs. Fish is not content to be a figure-head and to confine her activities to attending board meetings. She is in almost daily touch with the activities of the school and the children all know, love and obey her. She takes a personal interest in every pupil, and through her directly many have been enabled to have the advantages of school training. She spends the summer at the Lulu Thorley Lyons Home at Claverack, N. Y., where all the children are sent for a three months' summer outing.

THE GREAT PROVIDER

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

AFTER a season of teaching in Jerusalem, Jesus returned to Galilee, where he continued his ministry of love and power. On one occasion, he crossed the Sea of Galilee, "and a great multitude followed him, because they saw his miracles which he did on them that were diseased." Wonder and curiosity, as well as personal need, had conspired to bring so many together. Many had brought sick ones with them, and that at great inconvenience, for "they followed him on foot out of the cities" (Matt. 14:30). His design had been to "go apart for a little season of rest" (Matt. 14:13; Mark 6:31-33); but "Jesus was moved with compassion toward them, and he healed their sick" (Matt. 14:14).

Jesus was the first to think how the multitude needed food. He was full of consideration all the time and for everybody. "He saith unto Philip, Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat? And this he said to prove him, for he himself knew what he would do." Many of the difficulties we meet with day by day are sent to prove us, whether we fall back on our own poor, easily exhausted resources, or whether we will endure "as seeing him who is invisible" (Heb. 11:27); whether we will look at the things which are seen and temporal, or at the things which are not seen and eternal (II. Cor. 4:18). How truly "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd: he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young" (Isa. 40:11).

Philip did what most would have done under similar circumstances—he began to take stock of what was in hand. But Jesus was there, and "he himself knew what he would do." Thank God, he who sees the future knows always what he will do. At this very moment Jesus sees right through the thing which is puzzling you, dear perplexed child of God. You cannot understand your experience nor God's dealings with you, you do not see how things can work out right, but he sees all; there is nothing hidden from him; let him have the helm of your little ship and all will be well. Philip's calculation only landed him in perplexity: "Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little."

And from whence should come two hundred pence, and where was the store out there in the wilderness? Even at Philip's computation, each one would have only a little. But the Source of the manna in the wilderness was there; yet Philip had not grasped the fact; he saw only what was according to nature. This was the human side. God was about to reverse the question: "What are they in the hand of Omnipotence?" Jesus said: "Make the people sit down." "And Jesus took the loaves." Resources in his hands are resources in creative hands, transforming hands, adapting hands, almighty hands. He gave thanks before man saw the fulness of provision; and then he distributed. By the time the bread and fish had reached each man and woman and child, it was "as much as they would." Andrew's conceptions of a little for each one were left far behind. Philip's computations were nowhere. Oh, how, again and again, the words of John the Baptist must have come back to them: "There standeth One among you whom ye know not" (John 1:26).

"When they were filled, he said unto his disciples: Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost." When God fed his people with manna in the wilderness, each man had to gather for himself. Under the law, man must help himself; but Jesus feeds with his own hands those who come to him for the bread of life, and the disciples whom he uses to carry it to them gather up the fragments which the multitudes break off, and in which they see no value.

STOPPED SHORT

Taking Tonics, and Built up on Right Food.

The mistake is frequently made of trying to build up a worn-out nervous system on so-called tonics—drugs.

New material from which to rebuild wasted nerve cells is what should be supplied, and this can be obtained only from proper food.

"Two years ago I found myself on the verge of a complete nervous collapse, due to overwork and study and to illness in the family," writes a Wis. young mother.

"My friends became alarmed because I grew pale and thin and could not sleep nights. I took various tonics prescribed by physicians, but their effects wore off shortly after I stopped taking them. My food did not seem to nourish me and I gained no flesh nor blood.

"Reading of Grape-Nuts, I determined to stop the tonics and see what a change of diet would do. I ate Grape-Nuts four times a day with cream and drank milk also, went to bed early after eating a dish of Grape-Nuts before retiring.

"In about two weeks I was sleeping soundly. In a short time gained 20 lbs. in weight and felt like a different woman. My little daughter, whom I was obliged to keep out of school last spring on account of chronic catarrh, has changed from a thin, pale, nervous child to a rosy, healthy girl, and has gone back to school this fall.

"Grape-Nuts and fresh air were the only agents used to accomplish the happy results."

"There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Eighty Years in the Sunday School

A REMARKABLE illustration of the charm work in the Sunday School has for the consecrated soul is found in the life of Mr. P. S. Joslin, of Carbondale, Pa., whose years of service for the Master have been many and faithful. "His record as a member and constant attendant of the Sunday School," says one who knows him well, "is one of which few men or women can boast, since he has been a member of the Sunday School for more than eighty years. He has been clerk of his church for fifty years, and still holds that office, although he will be ninety-one years old next April.

"His service as a teacher in the Sunday School covers a period of sixty-five years, and in spite of his advanced years he continued his work until very recently, when a severe illness compelled him to resign. He testifies that nothing in all his long life has given him greater pleasure than he has found in the Sunday School, where he has succeeded in leading many boys and girls into the Christian life. How much the church in Carbondale appreciates his service may be learned from the fact that ten years ago a memorial window was placed in the Baptist church in that town in his honor by his Sunday School class.

"Deacon Joslin was born in Oneida County, New York, in the year 1817. He was but a little lad when he began attending a Sunday School two miles from his home. At that time the lesson hour of the Sunday School was devoted almost entirely to the reciting of verses of Scripture by the scholars, and there was always a good deal of rivalry as to who could recite the largest number of verses. Few questions were asked, and this memorizing of the Scripture passed for Sunday School instruction. It certainly had a definite value, which might result still if it were combined with our modern methods of instruction in the school.

"Deacon Joslin went to Carbondale in the year 1832, and with the exception of six years he has resided there ever since. He became a member of the Presbyterian Church in 1843, but sixteen years later, when a Baptist church was formed, he joined that, raising the roll of membership to seven.

"Deacon Joslin loved the work of teaching; he was at one time elected superintendent of the Sunday School, but he accepted it only on condition that he might keep his class during his term of office.

"His life as a citizen has been one of unflinching and beautiful service, and a resident of Carbondale, who is not himself a Christian, said of him recently, 'His presence is a constant benediction to the town.'

P. S. Joslin

Christianity and the Bible

JOHN VON MULLER, the eminent Swiss historian, declared, "Christ is the key to the history of the world. Not only does all harmonize with the mission of Christ, all is subordinated to it." The historian Lecky wrote: "It was reserved for Christianity to present to the world an ideal character which, through all the changes of eighteen centuries, has filled the hearts of men with an impassioned love, and has shown itself capable of acting on all ages, nations, temperaments, conditions." Fichte, the so-called "sceptic" and "atheist," declared that Jesus "did more than all other philosophers in bringing heavenly morality into the hearts and homes of common men. . . . Till the end of time all the sensible will bow low before this Jesus of Nazareth, and all will humbly acknowledge the exceeding glory of this great phenomenon." Richter, who satirized orthodoxy, calls Christ "the purest of the mighty, the mightiest of the pure, who, with his pierced hands, raised empires from their foundations, turned the stream of history from its old channels, and still continues to rule and guide the ages."

Renan, one of the strongest opponents of dogmatic religion, wrote: "Whatever may be the surprises of the future, Jesus will never be surpassed." "Bible Christianity," wrote de Tocqueville, "is the companion of liberty in all its conflicts, the cradle of its infancy, and the divine source of its claims." Huxley, the agnostic, in a public address said: "I have always been strongly in favor of secular education, in the sense of education without theology; but I must confess that I have been no less seriously perplexed to know by what practical measures the religious feeling, which is the essential basis of conduct, was to be kept up, in the present utterly chaotic state of opinion on these matters, without the use of the Bible. By the study of what other book could children be so much humanized? If Bible reading is not accompanied by constraint and solemnity, I do not believe there is anything in which children take more pleasure." Rabbi J. Leonard Levy said: "The best literature of thirty centuries is to be found in the Bible. Warriors have fought for it, martyrs have died for it. This book has destroyed tyranny."

If those persons [who object to the Bible in our public schools] have their way, and the Bible and all references to Christ are excluded, the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution, and the farewell address of George Washington cannot be read in the public schools, neither can the wonderful addresses of Abraham Lincoln, the Gettysburg address, his second inaugural address, or his Emancipation Proclamation, which broke the shackles from four million slaves and set them free, be read, nor can the "Battle Hymn of the Republic," which inspired the soldiers in the field, or "America," the national hymn, be sung. We must, in fact, become a pagan nation.—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

Answered Prayers

Reader, Horton, Ind. "Not long ago I was in great trouble. It seemed almost beyond bearing. I prayed to God for help. He answered my prayer. Praise his name."

Reader, Missouri. "I want to add my testimony to answered prayers. It is a privilege to let the world know that another testifies that we have a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God. He has answered one prayer of a soul accepting him, and another, purely a prayer for financial help."

Mrs. J. T. T. Washington, D. C. "I was in distress. The loss of my home seemed certain. I read Answered Prayers in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and finding a case much like my own, where prayer had brought relief, I went with renewed faith to God and he heard me and delivered me out of my distress."

Thrift demands a fair return from money loaned or invested, but avoid risk under guise of fair promises. Investments through the Industrial Savings and Loan Company pay 5% and without arbitrary conditions. Write them in response to their advertisement on page 155 of this issue.

Rub out, to-night, the wrinkles of today

"Comparisons may be odious—but they are human."

No one can avoid noting the contrast between the fresh, natural beauty of the woman who takes care of her complexion, and the sallowness, wrinkles and lines due to facial neglect. Yet any woman may regain and retain her natural beauty indefinitely by the simple use of the natural beautifier, Pompeian Massage Cream, the largest selling face cream in the world; some 10,000 jars being made and sold daily.

Pompeian Massage Cream

GIVES A CLEAR, FRESH, VELVETY SKIN

Wrinkles and crow's-foot are driven away, sallowness vanishes, angles are rounded out and double-chins reduced by its use. Thus the clear, fresh complexion, the smooth skin, and the curves of cheek and chin that go with youth, may be retained past middle age by the woman who has found what Pompeian Massage Cream will do. This is not a "cold" or "grease" cream. The latter have their uses, yet they can never do the work of a massage cream like Pompeian. Grease creams fill the pores. Pompeian Massage Cream cleanses them by taking out all foreign matter that causes blackheads, sallowness, shiny complexions, etc.

Music Lessons Free

IN YOUR OWN HOME.

A wonderful offer to every lover of music, whether a beginner or an advanced player.

Ninety-six lessons (or a less number if you desire) for either Piano, Organ, Violin, Guitar, Banjo, Cornet, Sight Singing or Mandolin will be given free to make our home study courses for these instruments known in your locality. You will get one lesson weekly, and your only expense during the time you take the lessons will be the cost of postage and the music you use, which is small. Write at once. It will mean much to you to get our free booklet. It will place you under no obligation whatever to us if you never write again. You and your friends should know of this work. Hundreds of our pupils write: "Wish I had known of your school before." "Have learned more in one term in my home with your weekly lessons than in three terms with private teachers, and at a great deal less expense." "Everything is so thorough and complete." "The lessons are marvelous of simplicity, and my 11-year-old boy has not had the least trouble to learn." One minister writes: "As each succeeding lesson comes I am more and more fully persuaded I made no mistake in becoming your pupil."

We have been established nine years—have thousands of pupils from eight years of age to seventy. Don't say you cannot learn music till you send for our free booklet and tuition offer. It will be sent by return mail free. Address U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC, Box 7—225 Fifth Avenue, New York City

LESSON No. 4.—By Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

Queries. Have you tried to spell in Esperanto? It is to be remembered that all letters have the same sounds as in English which are not found in the list given in Lesson I. Can you write Esperanto words as easily as you can pronounce them?

The accent is always on the next to the last syllable.

Names of Things in Our Homes

domo	house	tegmento	roof
muro	wall	etaĝo	story
tablo	table	planko	floor
seĝo	chair	plafano	ceiling

Write out the Esperanto words for the above figures.

Grammar

VERBS. PARTICIPLES

Present participle (active voice) ends in anta.

Kanti, to sing; kantanta, singing. Paroli, to speak; parolanta, speaking. Past participle ends in inta.

Kanti, to sing; kantinta, having sung. Paroli, to speak; parolinta, having spoken.

Future participle ends in onta. Kanti, to sing; kantonta, about to sing. Paroli, to speak; parolonta, about to speak.

Present participle (passive voice) ends in ata.

Movi, to move; movata, being moved. Fermi, to close; fermata, being closed.

Past participle ends in ita. Movi, to move; movita, been moved. Fermi, to close; fermita, been closed.

Future participle ends in ota. Movi, to move; movota, about to be moved. Fermi, to close; fermota, about to be closed.

Exercise. Brilanta. Promeninta. Kantanta. Aŭdinta. Kreskinta. Rompota.

Rompota. Ŝanĝanta. Ŝanĝata. Aŭdata. Aŭdota. Aŭdanta. Aŭdinta. Aŭdonta. Briletanta. Briletinta. Babilonta.

PROGRESSIVE TENSES

The verb, to be, esti: Estas, is; estis, was; estos, will be.

Active Voice—Estas kreskanta, is growing; estis kreskanta, was growing; estos kreskanta, will be growing.

Passive Voice—Estas kreskata, is being grown; estis kreskata, was being grown; estos kreskata, will be grown.

La stelo estos brilanta. La knabino estis kantanta. La steloj estis brilantaj (the participle has plural form to agree with subject). La filinoj estos kantantaj. La viro estis parolanta. La fenestro estis rompota. La libroj estos ŝanĝataj. La libroj estis ŝanĝataj. Mia nevo estis parolanta. La tablo estos movata. La virino estos aŭdanta. La luno estis brilanta. La knaboj estis promenantaj. La kuleroj kaj forkoj estis ŝanĝataj. La patrino estis parolanta. La onklo estas promenanta. La arboj estas kreskantaj. La pladoj estos ŝanĝataj. La matracoj estos movataj.

The participles are the most difficult part of the grammar. Be persistent, diligent and patient.

Exercise. (Compare the following with the first Esperanto exercise given under the participles.)

Shining. Having walked. About to sing. Having heard. Having grown. About to break. About to be broken. Changing. Being changed. Being heard. About to be heard. Hearing. Having heard. About to hear. Twinkling. Having twinkled. About to babble.

For the benefit of those who desire to take the Esperanto Lessons, but who have not yet begun to do so, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will send all the lessons in the course that have appeared up to date, on receipt of 10 cents. This offer is made for the purpose of facilitating the formation of new Esperanto Circles. Since these lessons began, many hundreds of Circles have been organized throughout the country, and what is probably the largest Esperanto propaganda the world has ever known is now fairly under way. We advise all who are interested in this novel and attractive study to take this opportunity to join the movement, form local Circles and establish correspondence clubs all over the world. All you need to do at first is to form a Circle to study the lessons that are now appearing every other week in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We can supply you with the Primer (10c), Vocabulary (10c) and Text Book (25c) if desired.

Esperanto Inquiries

F. D. Smith. Never heard of it. E. D. Longcoe. The Primer costs ten cents by mail.

L. C. Jones. We can send you the Key to Esperanto for five cents.

Mrs. R. Lane. Pronounced Es-pay-rah-to, stay-loj, brah koy, oy as in boy.

Fred. Stewart. We can send Esperanto Primer and Vocabulary, ten cents each.

Eldridge Smith. American Esperanto Journal, New York, and Amerika Esperantisto, Chicago.

G. W. Y., Cambridge, Mass. The study of Esperanto can be begun without a previous study of English grammar, although such study would facilitate the learning of the new language.

Mrs. S. E. B., South Scituate, R. I. "Cervo" is pronounced tsair-vo; "hajlo," like the English words "high low," "lerta," like "lair tair;" and o have their long sounds when they end words or syllables; thus "nevo," pronounced nay-vo; short when followed by two consonants; thus, "edzo," pronounced ed-zo, as in English; "longa," like the English word "longer," except that the last syllable is pronounced "gah."

English Women Want to Vote

Arresting "Suffragettes" Near the Prime Minister's House, London

ENGLAND'S capital is greatly exercised over the courageous attitude of the "Suffragettes," as they call the women who are now publicly agitating in favor of the movement for granting the suffrage to their sex. Many times within the last few months women have been arrested, some of them for public speaking, others for attempting to force an entrance into Parliament, where they were determined to be heard, and, more recently, for trying to gain admittance to the Prime Minister's house in Downing Street. While the Cabinet Council was sitting at 10 Downing Street, recently, the Suffragettes tried to force their way into the house. Two of them, Miss New and Miss Smith, chained themselves to the railings in order to make it more difficult for the police to remove them. With very little trouble, however, the officers snapped the chains, and five of the ladies, one of whom had actually forced her way into the hall of the First Lord's house, were arrested. Before the magistrate they refused to be bound over to good behavior for six months, and were accordingly sent to prison. There is a great deal of public feeling on the matter and the women are not without defenders, who believe they are entitled to be heard, if nothing more. In some parts of the United Kingdom they have won notable victories; but London is obdurate, and thus far they have received little encouragement there and many hard rebuffs.

Called Higher

Miss A. B. Beam, of Black Creek, Ont., Canada, a former subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, passed from labor to reward on November 7.

Mrs. Wilson Griffin, of Granby, Conn., passed away January 12. She was an earnest Christian and for a number of years an interested reader of this journal.

Mrs. Miller, of Anderson, Ind., passed away November 28, 1907. She was converted and joined the church at the age of seven and died in her seventy-fourth year.

Mrs. Janet Carkins, of Des Moines, Ia., died lately in her eighty-fourth year. For about seventy years she was a member of the Baptist Church and a most consistent Christian.

Mrs. Mary A. Carter, of Americus, Ga., nee Merriwether, who died recently, was an earnest Christian, faithful and devoted as wife, mother and friend, abounding in faith, charity, love and good works.

Deacon J. Foster Crosby, who passed away at Tusket, Nova Scotia, on January 6, had been a church worker for sixty-one years. He was a man of beautiful Christian attributes, beloved by everybody. This paper had been his companion for many years.

Miss Alsada C. Scribner passed away at the home of her sister, Mrs. M. S. Denslow, of Gates, N. Y., on the first day of the new year, aged eighty-four years. A true Christian since early girlhood, carrying the spirit of prayer and hope in her everyday life, she had been a reader of this paper for many years.

Samuel Oakes McCurdy, of Sunbury, Pa., died suddenly February 27, while in active duty as a railway postal clerk, having served in the same position for twenty-seven years. He was a lifelong member of the Methodist Church and a veteran of the Civil War. He leaves a wife, son, daughter and three grandchildren.

Mrs. H. Whitchen, of Groton, Utah, for many years a subscriber of this journal, departed this life January 5, aged ninety-one years and ten months. She was a devoted Christian from early youth. Her husband, with whom she lived fifty-seven years, died five years before her.

On Saturday, October 19, at Corryton, Tenn., Mrs. Emma McBee passed away at the ripe age of seventy-six. She was a reader of this journal for many years. Early in her girlhood she gave her heart to Christ, and joined the Presbyterian Church, of which she was a member until her death. She was the mother of eleven children, four of whom preceded her to the Glory Land. She leaves behind her four daughters and three sons. She was a mother beloved, full of the spirit of Christ, and her life was simple and sincere.

Mrs. M. A. S. Monagon, for a number of years a prominent mission worker in the city of Washington, passed away recently at the age of forty-five. She had just returned from a two weeks' sojourn at the famous Jackson Grove camp meeting grounds, located midway between Washington and Baltimore, where she had been actively engaged in winning souls to Christ. At the time of her death she was prominently identified with the Gospel Mission and open-door work of Washington. On Sunday night, September 8, a memorial service was held in her honor at the Gospel Mission. "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them." Rev. 14: 13.

COFFEE DRINKING

A Doctor Says it Weakens the Heart.

"In my opinion," says a well-known German physician, "no one can truthfully say that coffee agrees with him, as it has long since been proven that caffeine, contained in coffee, is an injurious, poisonous substance which weakens and degenerates the heart muscles."

"For this reason the regular use of coffee, soon or late, causes a condition of undernourishment, which leads to various kinds of organic disease."

"Convinced of this fact, I have often sought for some healthful beverage to use instead of coffee. At last I found the thing desired in Postum. Having had occasion to forbid people using coffee whose hearts were affected, I have recommended Postum as a beverage, since it is free from all injurious or exciting substances. I know this from results in my own family and among patients."

"Hundreds of persons who now use Postum in place of coffee are greatly benefited thereby." "There's a Reason."

ADVANCE OF THE GRAND ARMY.

NAPOLEON'S NAME fills more pages in the world's solemn history than that of any other mortal. The advance of his Grand Army into Russia is the turning-point in his career and marks the beginning of his downfall. The picture shown herewith, from Ridpath's History, the original of which was displayed at the World's Fair at Chicago, marks but one event out of thousands which are fully described and illustrated in the world-famed publication,

Ridpath's History of the World

THE PUBLISHER'S FAILURE placed in our hands the entire unsold edition of this monumental work. BRAND NEW, down to date, beautifully bound in Half-Morocco, which we must sell immediately. We are offering the remaining sets At LESS than even damaged sets were ever sold

We will name our price only in direct letters to those sending the coupon below. Tear off the coupon, write name and address plainly and mail now before you forget it. Dr. Ridpath's family derive their income from his History, and to print our price broadcast for the sake of more quickly selling these few sets would cause great injury to future sales. Send Coupon To-day.

The Christian Herald says:

"Ridpath's History of the World may be regarded as a complete library in itself. No other work of its kind has ever supplied a History so well suited to the needs of all classes and conditions of men. We mark the marvelous influence of Christianity upon the world's progress. He would be a blind reader of history indeed who did not discern, throughout all, the influence of a great Omnipotent hand, guiding and developing all things. We cheerfully commend this most popular and complete of all world histories to our readers. These nine handsomely bound volumes will make the very best nucleus for a family library, and will be a potent educator of the young and a mine of valuable information for readers of all ages."

Volumes
4,000 Pages
2,000 Illustrations

RIDPATH'S enviable position as an historian is due to his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian has ever equaled. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to sit in the Roman senate; to march against Saladin and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan; to watch that thin line of Greek spearmen work havoc with the Persian hordes on the field of Marathon; to know Napoleon as you know Roosevelt.

RIDPATH in your home means you need never spend a lonely evening. You can associate with the world's heroes; you can cross the Rubicon with Cæsar, after which Rome was free no more. You can sit at the feet of Socrates, the loftiest genius of the ancient world. You can kneel at the shrine of Lincoln, "the greatest character of all time, the gentlest memory of our world." It is ennobling to commune with these children of destiny. To be associated with great men is to be great one's self, and you will add to your store of knowledge which is power, and to the richness of your life.

Send Coupon To-day

RIDPATH takes you back to the dawn of history, long before the pyramids of Egypt were built; down through the romantic troubled times of Chaldea's grandeur and Assyria's magnificence; of Babylon's wealth and luxury; of Grecian and Roman splendor; of Mohammedan culture and refinement; of French elegance and British power; of American patriotism and religious freedom, to the dawn of yesterday. He covers every race, every nation, every time, and holds you spellbound by his wonderful eloquence. Nothing more interesting, absorbing and inspiring was ever written by man.

RIDPATH throws the mantle of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there—patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Xerxes, from his mountain platform, sees Themistocles, with three hundred and fifty Greek ships, smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail, and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as the synonym of savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Bismarck is there—gruff, overbearing, a giant pugilist in the diplomatic ring, laughing with grim disdain at France, which says "You shall not." Washington is there, "four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, proof against the wiles of British strategy and the poisoned darts of false friends; clear-seeing over the heads of his fellow-countrymen, and on into another century—the most colossal world-figure of his time!

Questions and Answers

J. B. Anderson, Mo. Who was Onda, and why was she so poor when she died in Florence, Italy, lately?

Onda was the nom de plume (or diminutive) of Louise de la Ramee, an English novelist (French mother, English father), who wrote many brilliant but sensational books, and who from various causes, presumably extravagance and bad investments, came to poverty toward the close of her life. The British government, recognizing her fame, allowed her a small annuity, but it apparently was not sufficient to keep her from suffering.

J. B. Rahway, N. J. 1. What relation is the newly-proclaimed Sultan of Morocco to Aziz, the deposed ruler? 2. Is he a man of ability?

1. The new ruler is a half-brother of the prince he has displaced. Mulai Hafid is a few years older than Abdul Aziz, and was born in 1873, the son of a woman of the Mzaniza tribe of the Shawia. 2. Prior to his election as the Sultan of Southern Morocco, Mulai Hafid had been for ten years Viceroy of the South, during which period his system of government gave an impression of strength and great self-reliance. He made himself an authority on the Mohammedan law. Mulai Hafid has a cultivated mind, and is something of a literary prodigy. His songs are chanted through the streets of many African centres. He has also written a book on Cairo, and his contributions to Moorish laws are many.

B. M. Center Lisle, N. Y. I have read that the first battle of the Revolution was fought at Alamance, N. C. Will you please tell me if it is true?

No; the skirmish at Alamance, in May, 1771, was between bands of regulators, who were moved by patriotic motives in regard to the enforcement of law, and 300 militiamen under Governor Tryon. The forces on both sides, militia and regulators, were Carolinians. There were several clashes with the British authorities before the real opening of the Revolutionary War, which was the battle of Lexington, notably the Boston massacre, the affairs at Portsmouth, N. H., on the road to Salem, Mass., and others. It was the battle of Lexington, fought April 19, 1775, that convinced all the colonists, North and South, that the real breaking point had been reached. The words of the American commander at Lexington: "If they want war, let it begin here," show that the colonists felt that the troubles with the British government had now come to a point where war was inevitable. Washington, in his diary, says: "November, 5, 1789. Mr. Phillips accompanied us to Lexington, where I viewed the spot on which the first blood was spilt in the dispute with Great Britain."

X. Y. Z., St. Louis, Mo. What is the reason why more women than men attend church services and meetings regularly? In some churches the feminine attendance is three to one and often four to one.

There have been many attempts to solve this difficult question. Some have held that it is because woman is more emotional, more sympathetic, more religious at heart, than man. Others that men are too much absorbed in business to give attention to religion. Others assert that the great disparity occurs only in churches where "fashionable preaching" is substituted for the Gospel. Experience shows that the earnest presentation of the Gospel never fails to attract men as well as women. Wherever Christ is "lifted up," there is no lack of interest.

Reader, Omaha, Neb., and R. K. Quebec, Canada. 1. How long will it take to win the Nobel prize awarded and what is its money value? 3. What was Nobel's nationality?

1. For general contributions to the world's literature. 2. $9,000,000 was left as a fund, the interest of which should be given to those who had done most for the good of humanity. The interest is divided into five equal shares, one to the person who in the domain of physics has made the most important discovery or invention, one to the person who has made the most important discovery in the domain of medicine or physiology, one to the person who in literature has provided the most excellent work of an idealistic tendency, and one to the person who has done the most for the fraternization of nations. We have not the space to give the list of the recipients. Each prize averages $40,000. 3. Alfred B. Nobel was a Swedish scientist. Full information may be obtained from the Board of Directors, Stockholm, Sweden.

W. W. A., New Rochelle, N. Y. When and by whom was the Roman Catholic Church founded?

The question is a large one, involving many disputed points. It would be more simple if you asked when the church changed its character and took a new de-half plus $2,000, if so much remains after taking the one-half. If deceased leaves no descendant, parent, brother, sister, nephew or niece, widow takes all. Widow takes, in real estate, the use for life of one-third in all cases.

Reader, Mason, Mich. In about what year did the Apostle John write his books?

There are various opinions as to the date of the Gospel according to John. Godet, Alford and Macdonald believe it was written at Ephesus between the years 80 and 85. Tholuck thinks it was near A.D. 100. All are agreed that it was the last of the Gospels. Some have challenged the claim that it was written by John at all. A careful analysis, however, of the Gospel itself, and of the evidence for and against John's authorship, has convinced the majority of scholars that John wrote it. Besides this there is the testimony of Irenæus, who, being a pupil of Polycarp, himself a disciple of John, had the best opportunity for knowing the facts. Irenæus died

Mary F. J. Troy, N. Y. Can you inform me about the time being set ahead eleven days since 1600 A.D.?

In 1582 Pope Gregory changed the Roman calendar, which had been in use, since 47 B.C. The change was made because the short year was making Easter fall a little later each year. In making the change he had to throw out ten days. When England adopted the new calendar in 1752, she had to throw out eleven days.

First, from the second century to the eighth, which is "the common inheritance of all churches." Then the secession of the Greek Church took from it the claim to be the universal church. The second period, extending to the Reformation in the sixteenth century, when the Protestants, unable to endure the errors and corruptions of the Papacy, seceded under the leadership of Luther, Wickliffe, etc. Third, modern Catholicism, extending to the present time. This last period is subdivided by the reign of Pius IX. (1846-1878), when the Papal pretensions made a still further advance, and the church took on new form.

There were two persecutions under which John may have been banished to Patmos. One was in 68 and the other in 90. There is nothing to show in which, if either, of the two periods it was written.

Picturesque Indians of the Beautiful River Region, in the Highlands of Peru

THE HIGHEST TOWN IN THE WORLD

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

THE highest town in the world is located in the Peruvian Andes. It is 14,200 feet, or nearly three miles, above the level of the sea. The place is called Cerro de Pasco. There is a village in Bolivia called Sicasica, which is almost as high, and in the same section of Peru as Cerro de Pasco there is a mining hamlet called Morococha, which is even higher, being 15,000 feet. But Cerro de Pasco is a real town and not a hamlet or village. In the United States it would be called a thriving mining city, and would be pretty sure to appear on the maps as such. But in South America they are more modest and only call it a town.

When I visited it a short while ago, the population was 10,000, though, with the resumption of mining activity, the number of inhabitants was expected to increase to 15,000. In duller periods, there are never less than 5,000 persons. In the flourishing times of the Spanish colonial era, the population was larger than it is to-day; but probably not so mixed, since it was composed of poor Indians, their Spanish taskmasters, and a few negroes. Now, a good many nationalities are represented, since mines are magnets that draw people from all corners of the world. Many tongues are spoken. I heard a conversation which sounded strangely like one I had listened to on the banks of the Danube a year before, and was told this was quite likely, since the men who were talking were Austrian Slavs and they were speaking in one of the Slav dialects. These Austrians predominate in the business community of Cerro de Pasco, and control most of the trade. They are enterprising and have cash registers in their stores.

There are signs in Polish and Bohemian, and one sees Greeks, Armenians, Syrians, Italians, Germans and Frenchmen. It might be supposed that, since Spanish is the language of Peru, this would be the most commonly spoken, but it is not. The bulk of the population is composed of the descendants of the aboriginal of a considerable colony of Americans, Englishmen, and Scotchmen. The Cerro de Pasco mines, which are now great copper producers, are owned by a group of American capitalists. The superintendents, managers, foremen, storekeepers, office employees and all that go to form the personnel of a great industrial plant are mostly Americans. There are also the railway and the big smelter, which is located eight miles from Cerro de Pasco. The real American settlement is at the smelter, since it calls for a large number of high-grade workmen and expert artisans. Many of these are housed in two large buildings, which are called "the hotel," while families have neat stone cottages to live in. There is a good club and a reading-room, in which I found the latest magazines and newspapers from the United States.

The town of Cerro de Pasco looks to-day probably about as it has looked for centuries. Like most mining towns, it never was laid out on a regular plan, but just grew. So it is a queer kind of a place. The streets run up and down the hills as they please in all directions and at all angles. As in all towns which were founded by Spaniards, there are plazas or public squares; but in this case they are not squares at all, since they are triangular or with five or seven sides. Of course there are no trees, shrubs or flowers. The place is too far above the timber line for vegetation. All that grows in this region is a short, stubby grass, which covers the round mountain-tops and the slopes. The llamas and the sheep feed on it. Some of the houses are of two stories, with overhanging eaves, and look quite comfortable. There are several shabby old churches.

The climate is not so severe as would be supposed inhabitants and of the early Spaniards. These half-breeds are known as Cholos. They have preserved most of their racial traits, and in particular they hold to the Quichua language which was spoken in the time of the Incas. It is soft and musical.

I was surprised to find that some of the Cholos understood a little English, which seemed to be more generally spoken than Spanish. This is due to the presence

The Burning Bush

TEXT—Ex. 3: 15

"This is my name forever, and this is my memorial unto all generations"

IN reading the story of the call of Moses at the burning bush, we find the secret of God's selection of his own servants to-day for his own particular work. The grace of the Gospel is free salvation—"whosoever will," and whosoever won't. But the calling and election which we are to make sure is that particular form of service, to which he is particularly calling each one of us. And our personality is so wonderfully precious to the Lord, that he cannot use you instead of me; neither can he use me instead of you. And as we realize this in the Holy Spirit, it makes us increasingly desirous to make this our "calling and election sure."

You remember the story of Stradivarius, who made violins in the fifteenth century; a very godly man, who earned a great deal of money, and gave it all away to the poor and the church. He was getting old, and a friend came to him one day and said, "Stradivarius, do you think there is no one can make violins as well as yourself?" "Oh, yes," he replied, "and a great deal better. There are plenty of people who can make violins; but when God Almighty wants a real 'Strad' he can never find it unless Stradivarius has made it." And so God can never find your work unless it is done by yourself. Your individuality, your personality counts for a very great deal, because through it the Holy Spirit has condescended to make the channel, the human conduit of his grace, and as he passes through you, looking through your eyes, and listening through your ears, and speaking through your lips, and walking with your feet, from head to foot you are a messenger of God.

The Transcendent Light

Now, this was the lesson which Moses had to learn at the burning bush. Here he had been forty years feeding the flock of Jethro, his father-in-law, when just in the same old spot, just in the same old work, just at the same hour, suddenly the Holy Spirit appears to him in the form of a burning bush, and through that Shekinah glory, and in the midst of it, there dwelt the presence of Jehovah—Jesus, the second person in the Trinity, the Son of God, afterwards manifested in the flesh. And as Moses watched this bush, he turned aside to see the great sight. Not that a burning bush, humanly speaking, was a great sight in a very hot climate where such a thing was likely to occur at any time; but the peculiarity about this little burning bush was that it kept burning, burning, and never got any less. The hope of a prairie fire consists in the fact that when there is nothing left to burn the fire will die down; but this little bush burned and burned and was not consumed, because the immortal life of the Son of God was in it, and for the time being his manifestation was in the form of this little bush shining and shining with the presence of the Holy Spirit.

And when Moses turned aside to see, God spoke to him out of the bush. It is when we take trouble to listen and understand God, that God takes trouble with us. He turned aside to see. "When thou saidst, Seek ye my face, then my heart responded, Thy face, Lord, will I seek." The people who take trouble to yield to the Holy Spirit, and take time to be holy, these are the people whom God turns aside to talk with, and instruct, and lead in the divine life. Just like the teachers in the schools, they don't care to spend their time and trouble over idle, stupid, disobedient children. So the Holy Spirit does not care to spend too much time, and trouble, over those people who are not interested in divine realities. But as Moses turned aside to see,

God Called Him

out of the midst of the bush. There was Moses at the same spot, the same occupation, the same hour. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth": so is every one that is in the current of the divine Spirit. We never know at any moment when the wind of grace will fill our sails and bring us to our desired haven. We never know any minute when the grace of God will not overtake us just around the corner, and it is our blessed privilege to be always ready for the Spirit of God.

The common round—the daily task
Is everything we need to ask.

Well, Moses was feeding the flock at the back of the desert, and it is always comforting to notice how God calls his select people out of the common place and the daily round. It is blessed to remember that before one miracle had been performed, or one sermon preached, or one parable uttered, through the open heavens the approval of the voice of the Father was heard at the waters of baptism, when our blessed Lord received the commendation immediately after the thirty years' of home life at Nazareth, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." And as Moses turned aside to see, God called him out of the bush, "Moses, Moses. And he said, Here am I. And he said, Draw not nigh hither: put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." Ah, blessed be God,

We Can Meet the Shekinah

glory of the Holy Spirit and the Christ of the burning bush anywhere, not only in the cathedral or church, or convention, but anywhere and everywhere.

Each little bush is all aflame with God,
But only those who see take off their shoes.
The rest sit round and gather blackberries.

Oh, may the Holy Spirit teach us to understand the secret of the burning bush, that whether we are traveling in the train, or at home right in the midst of the cooking and cleaning, and the shop, and market, suddenly the Spirit comes to his temple and we are filled with the glory of the Lord. God had a great work for this man. He said, "I have surely seen the affliction of my people which are in Egypt, and have heard their cry by reason of their taskmasters; for I know their sorrows, and I am come down to deliver them. Now, Moses, I want to send you." "Oh, no," said Moses, "I cannot go." Suddenly he became nervous, and said that he was not fit. "Who am I, that I should go unto Pharaoh, and that I should bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt?"

Moses had lived for forty years under the shadow of the dead Egyptian whom he had killed and hidden in the sand; and you may be quite sure that the devil got up a scare, and made a skeleton of that dead Egyptian, and rattled his bones in the cupboard of the memory of Moses. And this had so paralyzed him that doubtless he had quite concluded that he would never be fit for the service of God. He had thought at some time that he was fit for something. He was mighty in word, and deed, in the land of Egypt, and he had gone out one day to separate two Hebrew brothers who were quarreling together, but it had ended in failure. And Moses had to learn, just as we each one have to learn, to say very humbly, and yet very confidently,

The cross now covers my sins;
The past is under the blood;
I am trusting in Jesus for all;
My will is the will of my God.

We have to learn the lesson that Martin Luther had to learn when under conviction of sin, in that monastery in Germany, he went to bed sick in body with the weight of his sins, and an old man came to him and said, "Martin Luther, you repeat the Apostles' Creed every day, why don't you rise in the belief of it? You repeat every day, 'I believe in the Holy Ghost, I believe in the communion of saints, I believe in the holy Catholic Church, I believe in the forgiveness of sins,' now, Martin Luther, rise from your bed in the faith, in the belief of the forgiveness of sins." And Martin Luther came forth to be the great pioneer of the Reformation, strong in body, soul and spirit.

Moses Diffident

And as Moses pulled himself together, and believed practically in the grace of God to forgive and forget, he began to feel himself a little bit fit for his wonderful commission. But he said, "When I go before Pharaoh and before the children of Israel, who shall I say has sent me to them?" Ah, Moses remembered that he had to negotiate not only with Pharaoh, but with the children of Israel. Who was he, that he should undertake to pioneer that people out of bondage into liberty, out of Egypt into Canaan, out of degradation into dignity, out of poverty into wealth? Therefore Moses was greatly concerned. There was also another reason. He told God that he was not eloquent; that he had not the gift of ready speech, and that it would be no use for him to go before Pharaoh, or the people, unless he had plenty to say, and the right way of saying it. And you remember that God said to him, "Have I not made man's mouth? Certainly I will be with thee." And if Moses had only trusted God on the spot, and given his lips to God, he would have taken care of that right along. But Moses was too timid, and God said, "Here is Aaron, thy brother; thou shalt be a god to him, and he shall be mouth to thee."

Oh, that was only God's second best for Moses, and if Moses had only given his lips to God there and then there never would have been the trouble which afterwards ensued, because you remember that when the second famine of water was reached in the wilderness God told Moses to go and provide the water for the people; but Moses spoke unadvisedly with his lips, and the man who said he had nothing to say, was the man who had a great deal too much to say! "Hear now, ye rebels; must we fetch you water out of this rock?" Ah, it is a dangerous thing to make excuses to the Lord, a dangerous thing to refuse to give any gift of talent that we have to his service, for if the Holy Spirit does not get hold of it, we may be sure that the enemy of our souls will.

But as Moses thus accepted the will of God he was still concerned about the name of the God who wished to send him. "Who am I, that I should go unto Pharaoh, and that I should bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt?" And he said, Certainly I will be with thee. . . . And Moses said unto God, Behold, when I come unto the children of Israel, and shall say unto them, The God of your fathers hath sent me unto you; and they shall say to me, What is his name? what shall I say unto them?" Then God gave this wonderful reply, "I AM hath sent me unto you." Now this name of God at the back of Moses was absolutely indispensable for the success of his mission. The power of Almighty God behind the enterprise was the only source of its success. Moses knew quite well that unless he could bring before those people a name which meant a nature which was equivalent to, which was synonymous with all the power, and the wisdom, and the love which was needed, it would be absolutely impossible to make a success. But Moses knew, and God Almighty knew, that if the people could grip a name which would hold such a meaning, that would involve everything that was required, why, then there would be no fear of failure.

The Ineffable Name

And so this name was given, "I Am That I Am." Now, of course, these people had already known their God, their Father, their Jehovah in many different ways. In the covenant of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, they had the privilege of an experience of God in a fashion which no other people on the face of the earth held. And from time to time, God still comes to his Israel, for we who are Christ's are Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise, for the blessing of Abraham is given unto the Gentiles by faith in Jesus Christ. Why, we here this morning have had our blessed experiences of our great Jehovah God. Blessed be his name, we can give our testimony from time to time and we can say Jehovah Jireh, The Lord will provide; Jehovah Rophi, The Lord who healeth me; Jehovah Nissi, The Lord my banner; El Shaddai, The God that is enough. And so from time to time, we express ourselves in these names, and titles, or labels, or tags, which express, as far as our poor human language can express, the spiritual significance of the blessing which we have received. This is the value of the names of God, that they express to us in a sentence the very heart and significance of the blessing we require; and so when our bodies are healed we say, "Praise God, once again, he has been my Jehovah Rophi." When providence comes to us in a crisis, "Glory be to his name. He is my Jehovah Jireh." And when we know his leading, it is "Jehovah Nissi, The Lord my banner." And this is very strengthening, and encouraging, and intelligent, because it lifts our manifestations, and feelings, and emotions, and desires, and ambitions, right up to God himself, and in him we not only find the full complement and supply, but the very name which matches the human manifestations.

The New Experience

Now, this is very beautiful, and goes a long way in the Christian life. But we sometimes come to a place as these Israelites did, when it would seem as if all the experiences, and all the blessedness, and all the names of God, and all the manifestations that we have ever known, come practically to nothing. We come to a place, where, unless we can have a higher platform of faith than we have ever had before, we shall never be able to make a tremendous plunge into the grace and love of God. Unless we get a higher conception of what religion, and holiness, and sanctification, and divine healing mean, there is not a ghost of a chance for us. A place where the prayers we have prayed before are only an echo, and do not meet the exigencies of our present case, where the trials of the present moment are so keen, and intense, and unprecedented in our experience, that unless God shows himself to us in a new way, and we are able to get hold of him in a deeper, and a better, and a higher and holier sense than we have ever done before, we shall just stand still on the highway of holiness.

It is just in these predicaments that the wonderful nature of God always proves equal to the case. Oh, we need never be afraid, as the old experiences pass away, and the old prayers seem as if they are not big enough, and the old desires are just like baby things; we need never be afraid to go forward into the nature of God, leaving the names, and the labels, and manifestations all behind. For after all, these blessed names are only parts of his ways, and he is bringing us out of our little bits of experiences, our little bits of manifestations, our little bits of selfish prayers, our little bits of selfish service, right into the conception of what he is himself; and not what he is by what I know of him, or by what you know of him, or by what somebody else knows of him—a God that is sometimes big, and sometimes little; a God that is sometimes near, and sometimes far; a God who sometimes answers prayers, and sometimes does not; a God that is very blessed, and loving, and kind to-day, and hard and cruel to-morrow. Oh, this is not the conception of our Jehovah. "There is no God like unto our God, our enemies themselves being the judges."

And this is the name of the great "I Am" who comes before us this morning, as a wonderful ocean of the love, and wisdom, and the knowledge, and the greatness of the God with whom we have to do. Now the Bible from beginning to end is a very wonderful book, and you can study it in its homiletics, and synthetics, and analytics, and from Genesis to Revelation you will find it a marvelous mine of wealth; and yet after we have done our best with it, the first verse stands out as the most wonderful of all: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." But stop in the middle of the verse—"In the beginning"—and you have got all the analytics and synthetics of the Bible. "In the beginning God"—"Created the heavens and the earth" seems a little bit of an incident. Grip the fact of God; you cannot get further than that. "From everlasting to everlasting thou art God."

And this was the fact that Moses brought before the children of Israel: "I Am That I Am hath sent me unto you." Do not look at the past; do not look at the present; do not look at the future—just look at God.

"But," say the poor people, "that is so high, that is so great, that is so metaphysical, that is so philosophical, that is so theological; we are poor, downtrodden slaves, we want the old names; we want the labels: Jehovah Jireh, Jehovah Nissi, Jehovah Rophi, El Shaddai—why, they are our arithmetic, our time-table." "Oh, no," says Moses, "you have come to a place where your time-table and knowledge of

God has got to go, and you have got to launch into the unknown God, whom I declare unto you. But if you will stick to your old experiences, and if you will pray your old prayers, and if you will dump down into your old methods, then you will never have the courage, and the grit, and the energy, and all that is needed, to enable you to come bravely out, and kill the Passover lamb, and gird your loins, and sprinkle the blood, and march bravely forward through the Red Sea, without a groan or sigh, because your faith is fixed in a God who includes everything; and therefore as you live, and move, and have your being in him, you will find that out of the great immensity of his nature he will touch you at a thousand points, give you all that is required for time and for eternity.

"But," says Moses, "I am sure the people will never understand this." "Ah," says God Almighty, "I will wrap my wonderful nature in human form, and you shall present the manifestation of my deity in such a fashion that the people can understand it. I am the God of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob. Tell the people I am God, but don't scare them into thinking that I am some great Spirit moving up and down the earth, without shape or form. Don't scare my people by telling them that I am a Spirit unclothed." Glory be to his name, he is clothed upon in the human covenant of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. And so Moses came with the great message of the "I Am That I Am." And putting it inside the covenant, he came before those poor, heart-broken, down-trodden people, and he said, "It is in the covenant of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob," and they said, "Whatever is in that covenant is for us; whatever is in that covenant we may, and can, and will receive." And so they rose to the occasion, and came forth victoriously out of Egypt.

Just the same he is this morning. There comes the blessed message of the covenant of the humanity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." "I and my Father are one." As the blessed human Jesus of the four Gospels comes before us, we find in his personality, in his humiliation, in his flesh and blood, the very covenant of Almighty God, wrapped up in human form. He comes to us in words, and titles, as "bread," "vine," shepherd, "door" and "way." The human Christ, the incarnate Christ, electrifies the earthly covenant, and makes the human Jesus the very tabernacle of the Most High. It was this Deity which was the chief point all through his earthly life. You remember that the Jews took up stones to stone him, because he said, "Before Abraham was, I am"; and in the garden of Gethsemane when they inquired of him, "Who sent you?" Jesus of Nazareth replied with the terms of his Deity, "I am," and immediately they fell backward. He used the name of the burning bush time after time, and always proclaimed his Deity before his humanity, and thus proved himself to be perfect God and perfect man.

And in the blessed name of Jesus, and in the blessed person of Jesus, we have all the names of God, and all the manifestations of God; and throughout the boundless ages of eternity, as we look upon the Second Person in the Trinity only as God manifest in the flesh, we shall see in him the great "I Am That I Am," the memorial of his greatness, and his power, and his majesty; and as the greater always includes the less, how to him, and for him, and by him, is made everything that is made, "that in all things he might have the preeminence," "the fulness of him that filleth all in all." This is my name forever, the name of Jesus, and my memorial unto all generations, the great "I Am That I Am," into which are rolled all the names, and all the glory, and all the humanity, and all the majesty, and all time, and all eternity! Glory be to the name of Jesus forever, world without end, Amen.

THE NATION'S PROTEST

COLUMBIA (aroused)—"Put back the Motto! The people demand it. This Nation still trusts in God."

Letters Still Pouring in Demanding the Restoration of the Time-Honored Motto

FROM every part of the Union letters continue to come to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from people in all stations of life, calling upon Congress to restore the motto, "In God We Trust," to the national coinage. Recently another large consignment of this correspondence was forwarded to the Hon. Maurice K. Sheppard of Texas, author of one of the bills favoring restoration. They will be laid before the Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures.

From among the many hundreds of letters received, we give space to a few which are representative of the whole.

I hope you will continue to urge the people to have the motto, "In God We Trust," replaced on our coins. We are not ashamed to have his name on them. If we were, we would not be worthy to live in such a prosperous country as this. We cannot prosper in any way without God. Our Congressmen have the prayers of the people, that they may have good judgment in regard to this matter.

Olga, N. D.

GEORGE S. BEATTY.

Seeing so many protests against taking off the motto from our coin, I add mine. In my opinion, its removal is a sin against God, and an insult to the nation who put it there, and it brands the entire nation as infidels. We should let the whole world know that we are not a nation of infidels.
Tabor, Ia.

MRS. HARRIETT RUSSELL.

The motto, "In God We Trust," should remain on our coins. It is a very sacred one. It was put there by men of splendid Christian character, sound judgment and high standing. It should be indelibly written on the tablet of our hearts.
Darien, Wis.

MRS. J. H. TOPPING.

I am in sympathy with the movement for the restoration of those fitting words upon our coins, from which they have been removed of late. I trust public sentiment will be so great against the removal, that Congress will deem it wise to grant our wish.
Kingfield, Me.

REV. L. ARTHUR WHITE.

I wish to record my vote and influence on the side of the restoration of the motto, "In God We Trust," on all of our coins from which it has been eliminated, and I hope and pray that it may be speedily restored to its place.
Sharpsburg, Ky.

JAMES B. SPRATT.

From a reader in Oklahoma comes a remarkable letter. He has evidently conducted an enthusiastic canvass of his district, and the result is 572 signatures, of which 567 are for the restoration of the motto, and five against it. The letter which accompanies this formidable list is as follows:

Enclosed find the results of my canvass for the restoration of the motto, "In God We Trust," to our coinage system. We regard this removal as a very sad mistake, and we shall be glad to be informed of the result of the movement for its restoration.
Mottum, Okla.

C. H. HIGH.

Mr. High's letter and accompanying signatures, together with over 1,000 others, has now been forwarded to Congressman Sheppard, who, with Congressman Ollie M. James of Kentucky, is actively at work in the fight for restoration. The result of this canvass by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is instructive, and will doubtless be so regarded by the Committee on Coinage, which is now considering the three bills for restoring the motto. In the first instalment of letters forwarded to Washington, out of over 500 signers less than 20 were in favor of elimination. In the second instalment of 800 signers, only 5 supported elimination. In the third instalment over 1,000 signers favored restoration, and 5 were for elimination. Mr. High's letter shows that the people of his State are 120 to one in favor of restoring the motto. The same ratio applies generally throughout the country, which would show such an overwhelming vote in favor of the restoration of the motto that it would practically be unanimous.

A UNIQUE INDUSTRIAL HOME

By Mrs. Major Wood

THE newly opened Industrial Home at 535 West Forty-eighth Street, New York, is one of over fifty institutions of its kind in the United States, operated by the Salvation Army. It was erected and equipped at a cost of $125,000 and dedicated last June by Commander Miss Booth.

The object of this institution is to tide over men who find themselves stranded in the metropolis. The only credential a man needs is willingness to work. The home is always filled, and one hundred or more men accommodated are employed, lodged, and fed on the premises. Through their labor the place is made self-supporting, and when one takes into consideration the fact that the running expense is $800 per week, this seems truly remarkable. To accomplish this, sixteen wagons are out from Monday morning until Saturday night, collecting waste material, such as cast-off clothing, shoes, rubbers, furniture, rags, bottles, metals, books, magazines, news and all kinds of papers.

The basement is fitted up as an up-to-date stable, where about thirty horses are taken care of. Here also are the plants which supply heat and electricity for the whole building. On the first floor is the general office, furniture store, and baling presses. The second-hand clothing store is on the second floor, where in less than four hours every garment brought into the place the previous day is disposed of to people who are obliged to buy economically.

Another interesting room on this floor is the "assorting room," where every bit of paper is assorted, graded, and pushed through a chute into the baling presses below. Rags go through the same process. Different kinds of metal are put into piles, each of their kind.

The third floor consists of a reception room for visitors, a large, fine dining-room, a well-equipped kitchen pantry, men's sitting room, library, and a chapel, where Gospel meetings are held for the inmates of the Home, as well as for outsiders. Here is also conducted a Sunday School attended by nearly one hundred children of the neighborhood, and once a week a sewing class for girls meets in the same place.

The Salvation Army's New Industrial Home

With the exception of a modern, well-equipped bath room and lavatory, the whole of the fourth floor is given up to a single large dormitory. As the building has windows on four sides, all rooms are light and airy. The floors are kept clean and bright. Each man must bathe and receive fresh linen before he occupies a bed for the first time. The beds are uniform in size and new and comfortable. Every man has a key to a metal wardrobe, which has a number corresponding to that of his bed. The men are not designated by number, but called by their names. They earn all benefit received and they are not considered or treated as objects of charity, but looked upon as employees; in fact, everything possible is done to instill in them confidence and self-respect. Although they do not receive a guaranteed wage, an allowance of money according to service rendered is given them.

On the fifth floor are the repairing department for furniture, clocks, toys and sewing machines, and the cobbler's bench. The manager's apartments are here.

The wagons are stored on the flat roof of the building, whence they are taken by a freight elevator. The roof is used for various purposes, such as cleaning carpets, repairing mattresses, etc.

Men of all classes are to be found at this home, some remaining only long enough to earn proper and sufficient clothing to fit them for a suitable position, while a small percentage remain as trusty helpers to the manager. Outside of the manager and his assistant, every man has been recruited from the ranks of the unemployed. A telephone call or postal card brings the Salvation Army Industrial Home wagon to the door of any home to collect whatever one may wish to dispose of for the benefit of this unique philanthropic enterprise, which is helping to give employment and new hope and courage to many a fellow being who, but for this timely help, might sink and perish.

CURRENCY LEGISLATION AT WASHINGTON

SINCE the recent panic there has been great interest manifested by the general public in the various bills offered in Congress affecting the currency. The Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives is one of the most important appointed by the Speaker of that body, and has on its roll of members many distinguished names. They will consider the various bills presented by various Congressmen.

There is a general demand from the banks all over the country for a more elastic currency. The issue of bank-notes secured by government bonds placed as security would go on as usual, but they wish during a crisis to issue temporary notes to be retired when the time of panic has passed. Another scheme is to have a government guaranty for the protection of deposits.

One of the bills is called the Fowler Bill, and, in brief, provides for a bank-note currency guaranteed by the government. It would retire outstanding greenbacks, and the government is made secure by a fund contributed by the banks. It makes a complete reform of the present system. Then there is the Aldrich Bill, introduced by Senator Aldrich, of Rhode Island, which allows banks to issue currency if they deposit with the government railroad, county, State or city bonds. Senator Hansbrough, of North Dakota, would like to have a strong central United States bank, and an entire change of our present currency system. He says, however, that the country is not ready to adopt his ideas, and at present supports Mr. Aldrich's plan. Speaker Cannon also believes, it is reported, that the Aldrich Bill is the best.

A Gem in Red and Gold

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Our premium just received. "Twice Around the World with Alexander" is a gem in its red and gold cover, and is pretty enough for the centre table.

IMMIGRANTS FROM MANY LANDS

WHAT shall we Americans do to welcome and amalgamate the coming millions of continental emigrants with our present American civilization? It is true, the past century has been able to weave into a goodly fabric representatives of Germany, France and Italy, and hosts of strong men and women from Northern and Southern Europe. For the past few years, the procession of immigrants coming to our shores has been in about the following order: Italian, Hebrew, Polish, German, Scandinavian, and men from the British Isles.

What shall Christian America do? Foreign missionary work is brought to our very doors.

A talk recently with an intelligent Italian drew out the following conversation, even though his knowledge of English was very limited.

"Do you like America?" was asked.

"I love America," he answered, "better than Italy; but some day I go back to Palermo and buy a home."

The innate desire of the human heart to own a bit of land should be cultivated, and if our waste acres can only be sold to the incoming hordes, the tie to the New World will be more securely fixed and the new arrivals will be better citizens. Colonies of foreign-born population are settling in sections about the great American metropolis. Some Polish people are getting into the celery and lettuce business in the fertile lands of suburban Orange County, where the rich alluvial deposits are best calculated to furnish excellent vegetable food for a great city. Italy is furnishing our fruit venders, our shoe cobblers and many who labor with pick and shovel. What would we do without them to further our progressive American ideas?

A Moravian artist, Emil Kousa, of "Emigrants Nearing Their New Home"

New York City (who painted the picture of "The Emigrants Nearing Their New Home," which appears on this page), thus answered the question why he came to the new home in America: "I believe there is opportunity here to use my talents as an artist." He with his wife and two children is now studying the English language through the use of three Bibles presented by Rev. Ezra T. Sanford, pastor of the North Baptist Church of New York City, by whom the artist was employed to repair an oil painting. His study of French and German Bibles, with an English Bible and German-English dictionary, is his only school; but he will some day be a useful citizen of our great republic. His picture is full of hope and expectancy, even though one can scarcely fail to see in it some of the hardships of the old world. With the large standing armies of continental nations, men who might pursue the arts of peace are compelled to study the science of war. With the ownership of large land areas by the nobility of the old world, it is almost impossible for the peasant population to own any land. With the limited facilities for education and the many other drawbacks over them it is not surprising that we should expect this spring to see the vanguard of another horde of immigrants from the old world, full of hope for a new home in the land where liberty enlightens the world.

It is to be hoped that the Christians of our American churches and our Young People's Societies may give a true expression of the Christ-life to the incoming millions, that they who have not as yet read the Bible, may read it, and in their own lives become living epistles of the Gospel of Jesus. There is a great and promising field for missionary work among these people. Let us see that we do not fail to grasp this opportunity of spreading the Gospel among the strangers within our gates.

BRIGHT PACIFIC ISLAND GIRLS

IT is only twenty-five years ago since all of this lagoon was in gross heathen darkness—the people were almost constantly at war one with another. Recalling these facts, it fills our hearts with praise to God that we are able to present to you these faces, from so many different tribes and islands, all gathered together in one home, together learning of our one Lord, Jesus Christ.

The remittance received through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for our work here was very acceptable at this time, for the destructive storm which swept over the Mortlock Islands in March last left several hundred people at starvation's door. We have, therefore, used this toward their relief in purchasing rice for them. Most of the inhabitants of the desolated islands have had to be removed to other places, as the land cannot support them for many years to come. Gov. Hahl, the high governor of the German possessions in the Pacific, thinks that not more than one-third of the land in the islands can be redeemed and recultivated, as the other two-thirds were washed bare down to the coral rock.

Several of our girls here at the Mission are from the Mortlock Islands, and some of them are now homeless, save as they make their home in this school. One girl is from the Island of Ta, which suffered most severely in the storm, one hundred and seventy-three out of five hundred inhabitants being swept away on that terrible night. About fifty of this number succeeded in keeping afloat until they were borne by the wind and current to the opposite side of the lagoon, fifteen miles distant, and escaped with their lives on a low island there.

One of the girls shown in the photograph, sitting in front to the left hand, is also from the Mortlocks. In August last she was married to a young man of the Training School, and they have been stationed out as teachers at a village not very far distant, where they are doing good work. The intention had been to place them at this village temporarily, until an opportunity offered to send them to Losap, an island about sixty few days ago, the chief and people of the village where miles from Truk; but when this opportunity came a they are working pleaded so earnestly to have them left there, that it was thought best to allow them to remain. The young girl standing at the extreme left of the photograph is also from the Mortlocks, and is the daughter of one of our native teachers. The others are from the different islands of this lagoon, three of them coming from Uman, which is most advanced in civilization of any of our out-stations here.

Little Lucinda was a spoiled child, the daughter of a chief, and when first admitted to the Mission school, was in the habit of giving way to her anger in the most reckless manner, stamping her feet, throwing herself upon the floor and tearing her hair; but she controls herself much better now, and is very bright and happy.

Beulah, of Uela, is about seventeen. She is extremely fond of music, and remembers almost every tune she has ever heard, and the words also, whether they be English, German Marshall, or her mother tongue, Truk. Her mother was one of the first girls educated in this mission school, and was a bright Christian. Both she and her husband died while Beulah was still very young, and they gave their little daughter to Mrs. Logan, who was at that time in charge of this school.

Lienesap, another girl, is from Masairan, one of the villages on this Island of Toloas. Her mother attended the Girls' Mission School at Ponape before a school had been started on Truk, but she has since relapsed into heathenism. Lottie is from Tol, the most westerly island in the lagoon. ELIZABETH BALDWIN.

[The Caroline Islands, from which Miss Baldwin writes, are a group in the Western Pacific Ocean, lying between the Marshall and Pelew Islands. They have about 22,000 population, and are under German control. The people are Polynesians, and were savages and ancestor worshippers, without any conception of a God, until the American missionaries began work there in 1852. Practically the entire group is now Christianized and civilized.]

Among the Workers

DR. JAMES M. GRAY and DR. D. B. TOWNER are conducting a series of meetings under the auspices of the churches of Erie, Pa. Dr. Gray next goes to St. Joseph, Mo., to conduct meetings in the Presbyterian churches of that city and environs.

UNDER THE Gospel preaching of Rev. W. E. Biederwolf, in the revival which has just come to a close in Amsterdam, N. Y., nearly 1,100 people found their way to Christ, and the city was stirred as never before. The movement was the result of a union of all the leading churches. Every night hundreds were turned away from the First M. E. Church, where the meetings were held, and overflow meetings were conducted almost nightly in other churches. Hundreds of people marched the streets in a great parade to a midnight meeting in a theatre, and one afternoon a thousand children marched in an immense procession. On Merchants' Day, practically every business house in the city closed. A great chorus led the singing under the able direction of Homer Rodheaver.

THE WOMEN'S NATIONAL SABBATH ALLIANCE held a drawing room meeting recently, at the residence of Justice MacLean, 2402 Fifth Avenue. About fifty persons were present, among them being Mrs. George A. Spalding, Miss Catherine Murray, Mrs. Wesson, Mrs. Henry W. Bookstaver, Mrs. John H. Coster and Mrs. Anthony Dey Nichols. The meeting was opened with Scripture reading and prayer by Rev. Charles J. Young, of the Church of the Episcopians. Addresses were made by Mrs. Clarence Beebe, President of the Young Women's Christian Association; Mrs. Don O. Shelton, President of the Woman's National Sabbath Alliance; and Mrs. Samuel Murtland, Chairman of the Extension Committee. A New York Auxiliary was formed, with the election of Mrs. Charles J. Young as First Vice-President, Mrs. Francis J. Worcester as Second Vice-President, Miss Florence O'Neill as Recording Secretary, and Miss Crothers as Corresponding Secretary and Treasurer.

Proposed Protestant Surrender

MOST evangelical Christians will hear with regret that a society has been organized to promote a union between the Protestant Episcopal Church and the Church of Rome. At a meeting recently held in New York, a regular constitution for the society was drawn up and officers elected. It is called the Anglican Roman Union, and its avowed object is to bring the two churches into the same relations as they had before the Reformation. In this it differs from the High Church, or Ritualistic, movement, which, by familiarizing the Episcopal clergy with Romish doctrines and rites, paved the way for individual clergymen and laymen to become Roman Catholics. This movement is a much more extended one. "It is not," said one of its organizers, "a plot to get a few Anglicans to leave one church to join another, but an effort to forward the corporate reunion of the Anglican Church with the Apostolic See."

Members of the Episcopal Church are therefore put on their guard by this frank admission. Perhaps it is better so than to have the faith gradually and insidiously undermined by teachings and practices of Romish tendency. Episcopalians know now the object sought, and cannot be led blindfold into a union without knowing it. The society openly proclaims its desire to overthrow all that Luther and Wickliffe and their friends accomplished, and replace the churches on the old pre-Reformation footing. They desire to take a step backward, and to give up all for which the early Protestants struggled and suffered. They propose to do all they can to restore the old tyranny of the Popes by adding to the power the pontiff now wields the whole power of the Episcopal Church. It is a humiliating confession, a surrender of principle, which should put every member of the church on the alert.

The time chosen is the more significant because the Pope has recently been at some pains to show that neither the Romish church nor its head has changed its principles. It is not a converted nor even a renovated church with which Episcopalians are to be united, but a church with all its old faults, its old tyrannical methods, its old arrogance and assumptions, its old hatred of honest inquiry and discussion. We are under no apprehension of American citizens being led away when they know the facts. The Christian deplors the divisions of Christendom, but better separation a thousand times than union with such errors as Rome represents and the surrender of individual spiritual liberty into the hands of an Italian priest. Let every Episcopalian be sure that this is the meaning of the movement, however its character may be disguised under the sophistries of its leaders.

The March of Prohibition

LOOKING backward over the remarkable Prohibition victories of the last few months, it must become convincingly apparent, even to the most prejudiced mind, that the great cause of our Nation's emancipation from the slavery imposed upon it by the drink traffic is making phenomenal headway. Like all great reforms, the Temperance reform hitherto has been one of slow progress and many set-backs. Arrayed against it were the allied forces of corrupt politics and the gigantic brewing, distilling and saloon interests, whose ramifications extended from the highest legislative body in the nation, down to the local boards in our great municipalities, and even to the smallest villages. It has been an influence that sat like a blight upon the millions, spoiling the nation's life, and exacting a heavy tribute in shattered bodies, ruined households, crimes without number, and oppressive taxation to furnish the machinery to deal with the criminals.

It has taken nearly twenty-eight years to bring about the active and aggressive Prohibition movement of today. Kansas, in 1880, adopted Prohibition by constitutional amendment, and was followed by Maine, North Dakota, and recently by Oklahoma; Maine having really been a Prohibition State, though not constitutionally so, since 1851. Alabama and Georgia have followed their example, thus making six sovereign States that are "dry," whether by statutory enactment or constitutional amendment. These represent a total population of nearly 10,000,000 souls. There are hopeful indications that fourteen other States will soon follow the same course, although it may be a year or even two before the final step is taken which will complete their enfranchisement from drink domination.

These States are Mississippi, South Carolina, Florida, Connecticut, Vermont, New Hampshire, District of Columbia, Tennessee, North Carolina, Arkansas, Iowa, Michigan, Missouri and Delaware. In all of these States, a vigorous campaign is now in progress and great hopes are entertained of early action by the different legislatures. Besides these, the Prohibitionists are also bending their energies to carry Kentucky, Texas, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Nebraska, Massachusetts and South Dakota. The aggregate population of these twenty-two States is over 30,000,000. In several other States, too, the liquor line is demoralized, and thirty-three large cities have become Prohibition municipalities within a year, while there are considerable rural sections in other States that have decided for Prohibition.

All the signs are hopeful of a coming triumph which will eclipse the recent victories. Even a partial success would give a tremendous impulse to the movement in the immediate future. A sweeping triumph would mean that more than half the nation would be under Prohibition. To the drink traffic, it would be the beginning of the end.

Compulsory Arbitration

IN the announcement officially made in the Reichstag last week, that Germany would sign the agreement reached by the Peace Conference at The Hague last summer, students of the peace movement may recognize a significant indication of the increasing favor of the compulsory arbitration principle in the cabinets of Europe.

It will be remembered that not Germany alone, but other "Great Powers," postponed affixing their signatures to the agreement at that time. It was argued then that the establishment of a Court of Compulsory Arbitration would endanger the whole principle of arbitration; but it was really only a question of the leading governments proceeding slowly and with great caution, instead of adopting by a single stroke of the pen a policy new and strange to the world of kings, cabinets and armies. Germany, since the Conference, has come to an understanding with several States on the mutual basis of compulsory arbitration. Whether any other European government has followed a similar course has not been divulged, although it is a fair presumption that such is the case.

Baron d'Estournelles de Constant, France's accomplished representative in the Hague Conference, in a recent review has directed attention to the fact, not generally understood, that obligatory arbitration scored a virtual triumph in the Conference. Its principle was affirmed and its application from that instant became only a question of opportunity and experience. He writes:

And does any one think that this solemn affirmation is to remain negligible in the eyes of the world, and that the different peoples will not have it recorded, so that they may be able to recall it to their governments at the proper moment? And, besides, as to the question of application itself, thirty-five States out of forty-four have declared themselves ready to favor a general treaty of obligatory arbitration. This alone constitutes an innovation in every way worthy of the twentieth century.

This conversion of the minority to the views of the majority would be in some respects a far greater triumph for compulsory arbitration than if the whole vote had been cast in its favor last summer. As Dr. Kriege explained in the German Parliament, it is the result of conviction that is the fruit of experience. Peace-lovers can now look forward with exalted hopes to the next Conference. Let us trust that the presage of France's eloquent representative may soon be realized, and that the present age may yet see a State that wishes to avoid war, replying to its aggressor: "I appeal to the judges of The Hague!"

A Test of Endurance

PEOPLE the world over admire brave men and brave deeds, especially if the bravery is shown in some cause that will be of benefit to the country or to humanity. The present trip to Paris being made by a number of daring automobilists, while of great interest, cannot be of much value to science, and may well be termed an endurance test for both the men and the machines. The long trip to Alaska, and from the other side of Bering Strait to Paris, is beset with grave dangers, and it seems almost certain that some of the contestants who started so light-heartedly from New York will not live to see the end of the journey. The distance to be covered is twenty thousand miles, and in long stretches in Alaska and in Siberia there will be found no roads. As one writer expressed it, the trip is fully as dangerous as a dash for the North Pole.

The machines have been loaded with extra parts and provided with fire-arms, for in some districts through which they will pass, savage beasts and still more savage men will look upon the travelers in the cars as their legitimate prey.

It shows what a place the automobile has taken in the twentieth century when it is used as the vehicle in such stupendous journeys. The men who get safely through will be regarded by the world at large as heroes, but one cannot help but think how much really useful work might be accomplished if the same daring and courage were turned into other channels.

It has come as a surprise to many and caused them to brush up their knowledge of geography to find that there is a possible land route to Paris from New York, broken only by two narrow stretches of water from San Francisco to Valdez, Alaska, and across Bering Strait. In fact, it would seem possible to eliminate the first, as there is land connection, leaving but the gap at the strait.

Some engineers with prophetic minds have declared that some day Bering Strait will be bridged. At present this seems a mere fantasy, but so many wonderful things are being carried out in this age of achievement that it would be unsafe to say that such a scheme some day in the future may not be made a reality.

Entertaining the Preacher

Back from the country church, with the preacher of the day as a guest, the genial elder and his family are on the way to the old homestead. We can imagine, from the faces of the hosts, the kind of entertainment the worthy minister will have. The hospitable couple at the head of the household will make him heartily welcome, and the young people are scarcely likely to be so absorbed in their own affairs as to neglect the pastor. He will be cheered and encouraged in his work and will give and receive stimulus in the Christian life. Well is it for any family when it is in close touch with a servant of God, who is able to give counsel in prosperity and comfort in adversity. His presence in the home is a benediction, a blessed influence on young and old that never loses its power.

The Start of the Great New York to Paris Automobile Journey. Witnessed by 250,000 Spectators

From New York to Paris

THERE was a huge crowd in Times Square, New York, on February 12 to see the start of the six automobiles which are to make the unprecedented journey to the French capital. Every one wanted to see the men who have undertaken to guide the machines over the twenty thousand miles that lie between them and their goal. It is estimated that during the trip from Thirty-sixth Street to Two Hundredth Street, being the first eight miles of the journey, the automobilists passed through streets lined with nearly a quarter of a million spectators. Three of the cars were French, one German, one Italian and one American. They were watched with intense curiosity. Instead of the usual equipment the cars were laden with spare parts, ropes, jacks, picks, shovels and firearms, showing that the crews had foreseen many of the difficulties of the journey and had provided for them as far as they were able. On each car was the driver, the assistant driver and the mechanic. Besides these the American car carried the correspondent of the New York Times, which newspaper has co-operated with the Matin, of Paris, in arranging the details. One of the French cars carried a representative of the Matin, and the Italian car had at the start also an additional passenger. There will be pilots at various points on the route. All the men are in the prime of life. The oldest is Capt. Hansen, on one of the French cars, who is forty-three. The youngest is M. Livier, also French, who is nineteen. The ages of the others average about thirty. None of them has had any experience of Arctic travel, but they have had the advice of experts, and have made such preparations as to clothing and necessities as should make them invulnerable to the Arctic blasts.

They are to proceed almost due west from Albany, N. Y., until they approach the Sierra Nevada mountains. There they will be guided by weather conditions. If they learn that there is much snow in the passes, they will make a detour to the south, passing just north of Los Angeles, Cal., and thence northward along the coast to San Francisco, thus adding about eight hundred miles to the journey. At San Francisco the cars will be carried by boat to Seattle, Wash., and thence to Valdez in Alaska. From Valdez the route follows the Government trail to Fairbanks, then along the Yukon almost to its mouth, and thence to Bering Strait. There a delay is expected while the cars are dismantled and carried on sleds and skin boats over the twenty-eight-mile gap between the two continents, as may be determined by the condition of the ice. On the Asiatic side, the route follows the northern coast of Siberia to the mouth of the Lena at Boulong, and thence southerly to Irkutsk through a comparatively unknown country for three thousand miles. At Irkutsk they again touch civilization and the worst of their difficulties are over. The run to Moscow and thence to Paris is over well-known ground that has been already traversed by automobile. No effort has been spared in providing for the safety of the adventurous travelers. Thousands of dollars have been spent in depositing gasoline on the route at various places where it may be needed, as in Alaska and the Siberian desert; and arrangements have been made for telegrams to be sent wherever possible, reporting the progress of the party. As an encouragement to persevere a prize of a thousand dollars has been promised to any one of the travelers who carries into Paris an American flag which has been furnished to him in New York. The journey will be a prodigious test of endurance for the men as well as the machines. They will penetrate regions unknown to human beings and must spend days and nights in vast silences where human help could not reach them, no matter how sorely they needed it. In such conditions they should have the sustaining faith of the Psalmist, who said:

If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea; even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me. (Ps. 139: 9, 10.)

A Deserted Ship

The steamer Maraval, which arrived at New York last week from Grenada in the West Indies, reports seeing a deserted ship carrying a signal of distress on its voyage. It carried a valuable cargo of cypress lumber and other freight. It had its storm foresail set and the mizzen under two reefs. The captain of the Maraval went on board, but found no vestige of life. He thought that her crew had left in haste, probably being taken off by some passing vessel. She was completely water-logged and the waves were breaking over her sides, but though her decks were awash, she was sailing on, running day and night, with no light showing. The captain was urged by his men to tow her to port, as the vessel and cargo were worth over sixty thousand dollars. He decided, however, that in such weather as then prevailed, the risk of towing was more than he dare undertake. —It may be hoped that our government will search for it, as it is a menace to other vessels. Like the moral and spiritual derelicts in our streets, it is worth much, but, unsaved, may cause the wreck of others.

One sinner destroyeth much good. (Eccles. 9: 18.)

The Tomb of Confucius

Permission has been granted to a German expedition in China to visit the tomb of the ancient Chinese philosopher Confucius. The fact was not generally known that the tomb was still in existence; but there appears to be no doubt of its identity. Confucius died more than twenty-three hundred years ago, about the time that Ezra and Nehemiah were ruling the Jews recently liberated from Babylon. The veneration paid to the memory of Confucius by his countrymen has insured his tomb being kept in repair. The visitors found it in a cemetery six days' journey from Tsinan-fu, where the philosopher lies surrounded by the graves of his descendants. So little has the family traveled that seventy generations have lived in the village, and four-fifths of its inhabitants can trace their pedigree to Confucius. The tomb bears an inscription recording his name and fame. Chinese pilgrims who visit the tomb pay him divine homage, and even the Governor of the province is required to prostrate himself nine times before it, when he pays his customary visit. The element of veneration is clearly not lacking from the Chinese character. What a blessing it would be to the people if it could be captured for Him to whom it rightfully belongs!

Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honor and power; for thou hast created all things. (Rev. 4: 11.)

Our Fleet to Rescue a Castaway

The Secretary of the Navy is sending orders to Admiral Evans, who is in command of our fleet now in the Pacific, to send a vessel to the Galapagos Islands, six hundred miles off the coast of Ecuador, to rescue Frederick Jeffs, an American sailor, who is supposed to be living on one of the islands. Jeffs was on a Norwegian sailing vessel that was wrecked near the Galapagos Islands, and the captain and crew of the vessel made their way to Indefatigable Island, one of the group, in a small boat. The Norwegian Consul at Guayaquil organized a relief expedition, which took all of the castaways off the island except Jeffs, who was away from the camp when the expedition reached it and could not be located. The expedition left him a plentiful supply of food and sailed away, leaving him behind. Fishermen from Ecuador report that he is still there. The work of rescuing him will be difficult, for no ship dare approach that rock-bound coast. It is suggested that Admiral Evans detach one of his supply vessels for the work. It will go as near as possible to the island group and then send a boat manned with volunteers to search for the missing man. The incident shows how times have changed since ancient days, when the saving of one man's life would have appeared too small a matter to occupy the attention of the commander of a fleet. We can but wish that there might be a similar increase in the estimate of the value of the single soul, so that the rescue of one spiritual castaway might be the concern of all the churches.

I will make a man more precious than fine gold; even a man than the golden wedge of Ophir. (Isa. 13: 12.)

A Tramp Intrusion

A three-story brick house in Sixteenth Street, New York, which has been for many months without a regular tenant, was burned a few days ago. The policeman on the post was aware that it had not been rented, and was therefore surprised when, on passing on the opposite side of the street, he saw a light through the closed shutters. He forced his way in and found on the second floor a bright fire burning on the hearthstone. About a dozen men were making their escape from the rear windows. Apparently they had heard the policeman forcing his way in downstairs and had tried to conceal their intrusion by stamping on the fire to put it out. Instead of doing so, they had scattered the hot coals about the floor and thus started a fire in several places. They had been cooking a supper, but had not eaten it, and this, mingling with the hot coals, made the flames burn all the more fiercely. Before the fire brigade arrived the upper part of the house had been destroyed. Another illustration of our Lord's parable of the house swept and garnished. The soul which he is not allowed to occupy, becomes the prey of evil thoughts and passions that eventually destroy it.

Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there: and the last state of that man is worse than the first. (Matt. 12: 45.)

A Self-Imprisoned Traveler

A man has been taken to a hospital at York, Pa., suffering from mental distress that threatens to become dementia. He is a resident of Newark, N. J., and was at the railroad yard in that city a few days ago. The icy wind was then blowing a perfect gale. The man, chilled through, crawled into a box car, the door of which stood open, and took shelter. A quantity of rags consigned to a paper mill at York, almost filled the car, and on these the man threw himself down and soon fell asleep. The doors of the car were shut and locked, but the noise did not awaken the sleeper. When he did awake, the car was on its way and his cries were unheard. Not until the train reached York, Pa., and the car was opened, was the prisoner released. He had then been five days in the car without food or water and was a mental and physical wreck. There is an old adage that any shelter is good in a storm, but this man's experience shows that the shelter is not always safe. He had better have endured the icy wind and the freezing temperature, than have undergone those five days of darkness and hunger. The awakened soul is usually distressed and miserable, but there is nothing it has so much reason to dread as the sleep of indifference into which it may fall, that involves drifting from God.

They have healed the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly, saying, Peace, peace, when there is no peace. (Jer. 6: 14.)

THE TRUE BREAD FROM HEAVEN

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

N EARLY four years ago, on April 8, 1904, the writer, a Sunday School pilgrim, visited the plain of Bethsaida in a little boat, such a boat, probably, as that in which the Lord Jesus reached the same spot in April, A.D. 29, eighteen hundred and seventy-five years before. The pilgrim looks about; the harp-shaped sea is the same as then; the everlasting hills are the same. There is Mount Hermon, with its snow crown in the background; on the left the steep slopes of Gadara; on the right, the double-peaked Kum Hattin, Mount of Beatitudes. One city is in sight that was a part of the landscape in the time of Christ, Tiberias. It is on the right shore, about half way down the lake, close to the water's edge. The pilgrim looks for Capernaum; it is nowhere to be seen; a few fragments of stone are pointed out as marking the probable site. Magdala, too, has disappeared. The plain of Gennesaret is in sight on the right, where so many sick were brought to Jesus that their healing allowed him time neither to eat nor to sleep.

On the day following the miracle described in our last week's lesson, the people whom Jesus had miraculously fed went to seek him. It is always good to hear of crowds seeking Jesus, but it is discouraging when they seek him from a wrong motive. The people who hope to establish themselves in society, to gain a reputation for being good, or to win public confidence are not the kind Jesus wants as his followers. One such man crawled into the inner circle of Christ's friends and he betrayed his Master. The same thing is often done at this day. The defaulting clerk hopes to escape suspicion and detection if he associates with true Christians.

Permanent Satisfaction

Jesus could read the motives of the crowd that followed him after the miracle. "Ye seek me," he said, "because ye did eat of the loaves." Then he proceeds to teach them the lesson he taught the woman of Samaria (John 4:14), that the mere satisfying their physical wants, which he had proved his power to do, was a small matter compared with the satisfaction of the soul, which was also in his power. He wanted them to seek him because he could give life, which was as necessary to their souls as food was to their bodies.

"Jesus answered them." People who came again to Bethsaida on the day after the miracle of feeding of the five thousand, not finding Jesus there, sought and found him in Capernaum. Jesus is a searcher of hearts. We know that the people sought him chiefly because they hoped for more bread without cost, and were curious to see more miracles merely as sights and sensations. Bread in Palestine is baked food (kubz), but it has another name more full of meaning, aish, that by which men live. Jesus had this in mind when he tried to impress the meaning of the true bread upon the minds and hearts of his hearers. He would be to them not kubz but aish.

Bread is indeed to the Oriental the staff of life. He has raisins and figs and olives, but these he counts poor as compared with bread. So life may have its pleasures, its riches, its honors, but only God can satisfy us. He made us for himself and we are restless until we come to him.

"Labor not for the meat that perisheth, but for that which the Son of Man shall give unto you." They were on the wrong track. Jesus would show them the right way. "Him hath God sealed," attested. Arabs have a strong respect for wheat in any shape. If a morsel of bread falls to the ground, an Arab will gather it up with his right hand, kiss it, touch his forehead with it, and place it in a recess, or on a wall, where the fowls of the air might find it; for they say, "We must not tread under foot the gift of God." We often see on a loaf of bread a paper seal, which has on it the name of the baker. It is a guarantee of good bread and full weight. God the Father had sealed Jesus as the Bread of Life for the souls of men, in the power given him to feed the multitude with the five loaves and two fishes.

Edersheim, in his Life of the Messiah, refers to this incident as "the popular misunderstanding of the miracle of feeding." He attributes the misunderstanding to the fact "that the feeding had raised the popular enthusiasm to the highest pitch, and also after the chilling disappointment of their Judaistic hope in Christ's utmost resistance to his being proclaimed Messiah."

The Symbol in Stone

Edersheim also says: "It is a remarkable circumstance, that among the ruins of the synagogue of Capernaum, the lintel has been discovered, and that it bears the device of a pot of manna, ornamented with a flowing pattern of vine leaves and a cluster of grapes. Here then were the outward emblems, which would connect themselves with the Lord's teaching on that day. And here, over their synagogue, was the pot of manna, symbol of what God had done, earnest of what the Messiah would do; that pot of manna, which was now among the things hidden, but which Elijah, when he came, would reveal.

"What shall we do that we might work the works of God?" Was this an honest question? Jesus treated it as a sincere inquiry after a way of usefulness when he replied, "Believe in him whom he hath sent." "What sign shewest thou then that we may see and believe thee?" In this they laid bare the hardness of their hearts, and proved that they were not seekers after truth. "Signs" enough in healing and feeding they had seen the day before. "Our fathers did eat manna in the wilderness." They were demanding to be fed as their fathers had been. They did not recognize that the bread they had eaten was also from heaven. "Moses gave you not that bread from heaven." Though it was given by the power of God, it was not "true bread from heaven" in that it was not food for the soul. "The bread of God is he that cometh down from heaven." One may eat to the full of food, and yet be hungry in soul. Jesus alone can satisfy the longing heart. "Lord, ever more give us this bread." They did not yet comprehend him, but still thought of bread to satisfy their bodily hunger, which they could gather as their fathers had done, and yet thought it was to be in some strange way a more satisfying food. They remembered their fathers had come to loathe the manna and had cried for a change.

"Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out"

"He that cometh to me shall never hunger." To never hunger is to have that peace which passeth all understanding, that is, to be fully satisfied.

Break thou the bread of life, dear Lord, to me,
As thou didst break the loaves beside the sea.
Beyond the sacred page I seek thee, Lord;
My spirit pants for thee, O Living Word.

"Ye also have seen me and believe not." Jesus was again looking into their hearts, and finding there unbelief instead of trust. Joseph Parker said, "A malicious man can do more mischief in one hour than a man of genius can repair in a lifetime. Let a ruffian have his way for one night upon any minster or abbey, which was slowly reared through generations and centuries, and in the morning you may find it a smouldering heap. So with your infidels in their limited world: wherever they go, they leave the mark of the beast, and their country may be tracked by the desolation which they leave behind. To all such men you must put the practical question found in the text, viz.: 'If we go away from Christ to whom shall we go?' That is the question I would urge."

"All that which the Father giveth me shall come to me." And so Jesus expressed his belief that many would in the end receive the true bread from heaven.

The very heart of this lesson is the truth that was expressed when a young lady teacher said, "George MacDonald's books came into my life like an influence and at another time, 'Mr. Moody came into my life like an influence.' The bread of life means that the written word and the living Word, Jesus Christ himself, have come into our lives like an influence.

What Is It Like in the Bible?

I am the bread of life: he that cometh to me shall never hunger: and he that believeth on me shall never thirst. John 6:35.

1. Bread the staff of life. Isa. 3:1; John 6:35.
2. God's gift. Man cannot make one grain of corn. Matt. 6:11; Psa. 65:9; John 6:35.
3. Corn passes through many processes in becoming bread. Isa. 28:28, 29; 53:5.
4. Bread must be eaten. John 6:53-57; Jer. 15:16.
5. It strengthens the body. Phil. 4:13; Ps. 138:3.
6. It becomes part of ourselves. Gal. 2:20; Eph. 5:30.
7. The story of Elijah fed by the raven. I. Kings 17.
8. Elijah strengthened with food by an angel. I. Kings 19.
9. Christ feeding his apostles after his resurrection. John 21.

What Is It Like in Nature?

Back of the loaf is the snowy flour,
And back of the flour, the mill;
And back of the mill are the wheat and the sower,
And the sun and the Father's will.

"I will wear my pearl necklace at the banquet to-night."

The Empress of Germany it was who spoke these words, not so very long ago. It was after the birth of the little daughter for whose coming she had so longed. Up to that time those beautiful pearls had lain almost forgotten at the bottom of her splendid jewel case. As a great sign of rejoicing they were to be brought to light.

But when attendants went to prepare the Empress' toilet a murmur ran through the room. The pearls had lost all their beautiful sheen and color; they were dull, and of a queer grayish hue. "What is the matter?" asked the Empress, seeing the dismayed faces around her.

"Oh, my beautiful necklace! The pearls must have been stolen, and these worthless things left in their place!"

The court jeweler was summoned, and the pearls put into his hand. He examined them closely.

"These are indeed the same pearls, your Majesty," he said at last. "But they have become discolored for want of use and lack of light."

"What can be done to them?" was the natural question.

"I will try to clean them, but I fear they are beyond my power," was the answer.

In a few days the jeweler returned with the discolored necklace. It was still dim and gray.

"I can do nothing more with the jewels, your Majesty," he said gravely. "Return them to their native element, and perhaps they will regain their purity and lustre."

So, at this present moment, the famous historic necklace belonging to the Empress of Germany is sunk beneath the blue waters of the Northern Ocean. The beads are enclosed in a bottle, fitted with air-holes, through which the salt waves flow constantly. A buoy marks the spot where they are lying and a sentry keeps watch on the sandbank close by. Unless we feed upon Him who is the living bread we will lose that beauty of character which the indwelling of Christ imparts. We cannot shine independently of him.

What Is It Like in Daily Life?

A good woman, who was well known in her circle for her simple faith and calm trust in the midst of many trials, received a visit from another woman who, hearing of her, said: "I must go and find out the secret of her strong, happy life." She went, and introduced herself by asking: "Are you the woman with the great faith?" "No," replied the other, "I am not the woman with the great faith. I am the woman with the little faith in the great God." Faith is the hand that lays hold on Christ; the eye that looks to Christ; the ear that hears the voice of Christ; the mouth that feeds on Christ; the finger that touches Christ; and the key that unlocks the treasures of Christ. It is the channel of communication by which all heavenly gifts come from God to man. Happy are they who keep it ever open.

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

The American Sabbath

By Margaret E. Sangster

A Boy's First Sweetheart

WHEN we use the phrase, "The American Sabbath," our thought runs backward to those who crossed a stormy sea that they might find a place on this continent where they might worship God in accordance with their untrammelled conscience. Religious liberty was the boon sought for by the Pilgrim Fathers. The American Sabbath rests on the fact of its being a commemoration of our Lord's resurrection, the day being devoted neither to business nor to pleasure, but to the worship of God.

In the latter part of the nineteenth century thoughtful observers began to note a growing indifference to the observance of the Lord's Day, due very largely to the influence of immigration on one hand, and to a changing of social customs on the other. To-day, instead of the deep tranquillity and pure refreshment that the Sabbath once brought, we have the constant invasion of business and the fierce onslaught of amusement, making the day a convenience for those who wish to travel, and an opportunity for games and sports for those who stay at home. Motor-cars carry crowds of people hither and yon. Golf grounds and tennis courts in the outdoor season attract great numbers, and, in brief, the day is becoming a weekly holiday instead of a weekly holy day.

The danger has crept forward insidiously. Women whose mothers and grandmothers hesitated to write a letter or call on a sick friend on the Sabbath now invite week-end parties to their homes, provide for their entertainment any secular form of diversion their guests enjoy, and make no pretense of expecting that guests will attend church. In Christian households there is little to indicate a divergence between Saturday and Sunday, except in the fact that on the latter day the men of the family are at home. Provisions that could as well be purchased and laid in on Saturday are delivered in city homes on Sunday morning, so that grocers, butchers and bakers are obliged to keep open until nearly noon. By a little planning most housekeepers could prevent the delivery of anything at their homes on Sunday morning. Everything requisite for the table in these days of refrigerators may be brought and placed in stock for Sunday's use on Saturday afternoon. By a little judicious supervision a matron can prepare on Saturday the most difficult part of the Sunday dinner, so that the day may not be one of hardship to those in her employ.

The tendency to destroy the Sabbath is atheistic and in direct denial of divine authority. Those who trample the Lord's Day underfoot belong in the company of the multitude who leave God entirely out of their scheme of life. The tendency to spend a large part of the day in social pleasures legitimate on other days, comes to us from the Church of Rome, which is far less rigid in its Sabbath keeping than evangelical Protestant churches have hitherto been. What can we do to check the progress of disintegration, and once more bring about a return to the hallowing of the Lord's Day? The question is pertinent and practical. Reforms that are vital are not inaugurated with flourish of trumpets, the sound of drums: they are quietly started in individual hearts and homes. Each householder, each parent, each church member may set about improvement in the personal life and the home environment.

Not long ago, there were villages within an hour of New York and Chicago, where the old-fashioned sweet, tranquil Sabbath existed without fret or jar, as it had existed a generation ago. Little by little in those peaceful suburbs the sentiment has changed, not because there has been agitation in the press or issue at the ballot box, but because in one and another's home there has been modification so slight at first that it has hardly been noticed. Once we have recognized that there is need for improvement, the next step will be easy.

In order to preserve the American Sabbath we do not need legislation; we require atmosphere and influence. Women more than men have the responsibility of preserving what remains, and restoring what is lost. Young women can so hallow the day by their practice, can so gently show by their example what they think should be done about this day that young men will be swift to follow where they lead. We must not let it go. In the old Book there is a promise made by one who never forgets his plighted word: "Them that honor me, I will honor." May it not be that the present stress of circumstances, touching rich and poor alike, is a rebuke from Him whose day of rest the American people have treated with scorn?

GRANDFATHER'S CLOCK

Tick-tock, grandfather's clock,
Baby here in her little frock;
A hundred years and more, they say,
The faithful clock has been ticking away
Telling the hours one by one,
From morning's dawn till set of sun;
And all night long when the baby sleeps,
The clock its steady vigil keeps.
Little one with the flower-like face
You, too, with Time, must keep the pace,
Growing older one knows not how,
Till the snow is white where the gold is now;
And all the while, tick-tock, tick-tock,
The heart will beat in the grand old clock.

WHY don't you wash your hands, Jack?" Mother and sister plead continually with the boy that he will take care of his hands and fingernails, comb his hair, be particular about his neck-tie and shoes, and it is uphill work, until the dawn of an hour when the boy suddenly awakens to the fact that there are girls in the world. He may have told his sister over and over that the dirt on his hands was due to tan; he may have fought against tidiness with the strength of inertia harder to overcome than the strength of opposition. But one day he discovers that the girl across the way is very pretty, and, timidly or boldly, according to his temperament, he begins to perform little services for her. From that instant, the battle on behalf of cleanliness is fought and won. Jack now washes his hands, brushes his hair, polishes his shoes and attends to every nicety of boyish neatness without so much as a suggestion from any one in the house.

A boy has a succession of sweethearts in the years between twelve and twenty-one, each of them unconsciously helping forward his education, as he helps forward hers. Nothing is more wholesome and more to be sought than comradeship between boys and girls in the period of adolescence. A boy who has several girl friends with whom he is on terms of intimacy, is not likely to fall into danger from coarse companions or foolish excesses. The boy's first sweetheart is seldom his last, but years hence she may be pleasantly remembered, and years hence she may remember him and tell her daughters the good times they had together. Mothers should be as careful not to interfere with or disturb this youthful comradeship, as they would to avoid staining with ink a garment that they prized.

The Captain's Daughter

Census returns in this country show that men have no monopoly of the trade of navigator or pilot, since here and there a fearless woman has ventured to try her hand at managing a ship and sailing the deep seas. One day a morning newspaper contained the pretty story that follows:

"The Norwegian bark Angerona, Capt. Gjertsen, fifty-four days out from Buenos Ayres, got into port and docked at Erie Basin late yesterday. Capt. Gjertsen's blue-eyed daughter Lincoln, who is third mate on the bark, piloted her in. The Angerona left Trondheim, Norway, about a year ago. She had been a British vessel, but Capt. Gjertsen bought her and started out to get what cargo he could wherever he could. After a good bit of wandering he found a cargo of quebracho at Buenos Ayres. Quebracho is the bark of a South American tree, and is used as a febrifuge and in lung diseases, but Capt. Gjertsen didn't care what it was used for so long as it paid freight. He got his ship to the Hook last Sunday. Being thrifty, he refused the assistance of the tugs that swarmed around him there, and Miss Lincoln brought the bark safely through the Swash Channel, the short-cut in. She got the Angerona up to Quarantine."

The young girl from Norway showed herself as keen of eye, and deft of hand, and brave of heart as any Norseman could have been, and it is pleasant to think of father and daughter thus earning together their bread in the teeth of storms and gales, while they shared the mariner's life.

THANKS AND CONGRATULATIONS

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The Calendar came safely. It is beautiful. I enjoy the book, "Five Hundred Annual Stories." Wishing you the compliments of the season.

THE UNCONQUERABLE HOPE

By ELSIE SINGMASTER

YOUNG Arnold Jacoby stood at the window of his father's study, idly watching the steady stream of delegates to the national convention, of which Bishop Jacoby was president, as they entered the church next door. The bishop, who was also President of the Board of Foreign Missions, leaned back in his chair, his arms folded, his eyes on a telegram on the table before him. He looked more like a successful business man than a clergyman, in spite of his high-cut vest and white tie, which emphasized the shrewd, practical lines in his handsome face, and he conducted the business of the church with judgment which would have done credit to a captain of industry. He often congratulated himself that he had learned early in life to distrust impulse as a principle of action. Because of it he was now bishop instead of home missionary in Montana.

He looked up pleasantly now as Arnold turned and faced him. He regarded Arnold, cultivated, already learned, and always charming, as one of the great achievements of his life. Arnold, too, looked things straight in the face. If his eyes were eager, it was the eagerness of youth and not that of fanatic faith in ideas which would some day play him false.

"Are you really going to give up Africa?" Arnold asked. "Doctor Meynell told me that Bastian landed in New York last night."

His father held out to him the telegram at which he had been staring. It read:

"Roberts cables girls school disbanded mission set on fire is sailing. J. FORSTER."

"Roberts was sent out to hold the fort while Bastian had a furlough, wasn't he?"

The bishop nodded.

"Looks rather cowardly, doesn't it?"

"No." The bishop answered with decision. "Bastian has sent only the most meagre reports. This sort of thing may have happened before. It's only since Roberts went out that we've learned any real facts about the mission."

"Rather game, wasn't it, of old Bastian to hold his tongue about it? How did he stick it out?"

"He has some theories like Roe had about native remedies for fever, and he's lived though Roe died. But it wasn't fair to the church. We've been pouring lives and money into Africa for years, supposing we had a prosperous mission, and it was disturbing to find that it consisted of one ramshackle building and that the devoted converts were likely at any time to burn that and revert to the bush."

"Did they ever revert while Bastian was there?"

"Oh, I guess so."

"But he seems to have got them back."

"Yes." The bishop rose and gathered his books together. "But you can see there hasn't been anything permanent about it. The minute he leaves, things go to pieces. Roberts wrote us the condition of things three months ago when he got there, and the letters have just come. There was an understanding twenty years ago that if Bastian failed we would not try again. It is madness."

"Does Bastian know you're going to retreat?"

"Yes, by this time. Secretary Forster was to meet him in New York. But it isn't a retreat." The bishop was a little annoyed at his son's choice of words. "Are you coming over?"

"Oh, presently, I guess. I promised Mrs. Latham I'd look after her. Bastian was in your class, wasn't he?"

"Yes."

The bishop's eyes narrowed a little as he went out. Bastian had won from him the oratorical prize of their senior year in the seminary. It was one of the few great defeats of the bishop's life. He had prepared the speech weeks before, carefully selecting a subject in which he knew the judges were interested, and writing it with a view to their prejudices. It had never occurred to him that he would not win. Then Bastian, with a fervid, ill-prepared address on foreign missions, had swept his prize away. The bishop could see them now, crowding round Bastian and congratulating him. He was a big, homely fellow, whose face was occasionally made beautiful by a radiant smile.

Now he looked down at the convention from the high pulpit. Sometimes he felt that they were pawns in a great, wise, and interesting game which he was playing. He had an intimate knowledge of men; he was by turns a leader and an opportunist. He knew the clear-eyed, fanatic student fitted to work in the loneliness of a Western border mission; he knew the carefully dressed, clever youngster who would be popular in a city church. He always regretted when the latter condemned himself to the frontier by marriage with an unsuitable wife. The bishop had little admiration for nature's pairings.

They were all before him now, the frontier preacher, tanned, eager, a little impatient of the long service, silent for the most part, but flaming occasionally into eloquence over the necessity for more men and more funds, or the desirability of church extension. The West was very different from hopeless Africa. Beside these men were the cultivated preachers from the Eastern churches—Barnes, of Philadelphia; Bland, of New York; Mellen, of Baltimore; broad-minded, able, alive. The bishop wondered often if they did not share his agnostic conclusions.

The business of the morning, the first portion of which was left over from the day before, went on smoothly, the bishop appointing committees and settling disputes with the perfect judgment and tact which always marked his presiding. At half past ten there was a recess, then the delegates settled back into their seats. The bishop saw Arnold come in with two women, and smiled a little to himself. Mrs. Latham was a widow, young and attractive. The bishop knew that she would be willing to marry either him or his son, and she would make a suitable wife for either. But certainly he did not mean to marry again. Nor, he thought, did Arnold mean to marry at all.

When the bishop rose there was still a slight stir. Dr. Meynell had gone down the aisle to sit with Arnold and Mrs. Latham, and they were whispering laughingly. In the corner of the church a committee which had utilized the short recess for a meeting was hastily separating, and the doors leading into the hall were just being closed. The bishop did not seem to notice the slight confusion.

"Brethren," he began slowly, "it is necessary to reopen the question of Africa." He saw Dr. Meynell break off suddenly in the midst of his sentence, the committee slipped hastily to their seats, and men sat upright or leaned forward as was most natural to each in moments of excitement. The memory of the last discussion of Africa lingered in their minds. Not all of them had heard it, but they knew it almost word for word: the bitter quarrel, the demands of the friends of Dana and Roe and Lambert, who had died in the field, that the work go on, the harsh reproaches of the men from the West. It would be betraying a trust, they said, to give up: it would be putting one's hand to the plow and turning back.

In return, the advocates of abandonment, of whom the bishop had been one, had pointed bitterly to the expenditure of men and money, and the weary failures. Then Bastian had gone out, and for twenty years there had been only good reports; meagre as they were. He had dosed himself against the fever with native remedies; he had refused doggedly to come home since there was no one to take his place; he had made it, they believed, succeed. Or, had it not succeeded? The bishop's voice was ominous with important news.

He reminded them at first of Lambert and Dana and Roe, suggesting to their minds stories, incidents, descriptions, they had forgotten. These three great pioneers had died in loneliness. Roe had been found by Bastian when he went out, his body lying unburied in the mission house, from which the natives had fled in terror. They knew the insidious fever which did its work in a night, the still greater treachery of the natives, and the unknown and hidden terrors of the jungle. They remembered Mary, dark-skinned child of hope, brought to America to be trained as a nurse, and then reverting to savagery. The board, with the aid of the police, had found her in a cellar with the vilest of American negroes, to whom she had gone from the Deaconess Home. There was no variety of missionary experiment which they had not tried and in which they had not failed.

"We believed, however, during all this time," the bishop went on, "that Bastian was succeeding. Of his bravery there for twenty years we know. When we realize, however, that it has been a losing fight, of which he has been thoroughly aware, our admiration becomes awe. His life is an appropriate seal upon a faithfully performed experiment."

The bishop's eyes swept his attentive audience. At last they realized with him what he might have expressed as Africa's unreadiness for the altruistic principle. It was folly to try to hurry nature. He looked for an instant into Arnold's smiling face; then, attracted by a movement in the back of the church, glanced in that direction, and became suddenly silent.

How long the man had been standing there the bishop did not know. He was tall and thin to emaciation, dark-skinned, and long-bearded. The bishop was reminded of an aged beggar he had seen on the road from Jerusalem to Joppa. There was the same dark skin, the same white beard, the same brilliant eye. As if to complete the resemblance, the stranger shook with sudden chill, as the beggar had shaken with palsy. He was well dressed, though strangely. His heavy black suit was at the same time new and old. It was unworn, but it had been bought twenty years before.

He looked straight into the bishop's eyes for an instant, then swayed suddenly a little, and a student from the seminary who was sitting on the rear seat sprang up to show him to a pew. The old man—he seemed ages old—smiled, and suddenly the bishop knew. This was Bastian come home.

A hundred thoughts went through the bishop's mind as he went down the aisle: a keen remembrance of his defeat at Bastian's hands—thank God, Bastian had had that small success!—a vision of the mission as Roberts had pictured it, its desolation, its danger, the loneliness of this man's soul, shut off from his kind. A hot pity for him almost blinded the bishop's eyes. How the people in the train, on the boat, must have stared at him! The church would accept no more such sacrifices as this. Bastian might have been of vast use in America. Now his life was nearly over, and he had accomplished nothing, nothing.

He was aware of Arnold's eager eyes as he led Bastian up the aisle. They were like his mother's, who had died when he was born. It was after that, when faith failed to help, that the bishop had begun to speculate about the ways of nature. The old man—Bastian was, after all, only as old as the bishop himself—would have held back, but the bishop's arm around him compelled him to go. The audience stared, uncomprehending, until a deep-eyed young zealot, who, in his lonely house in Montana, had thought often of that other lonely house in Liberia, sprang to his feet.

"It is Bastian come home," he said, with tears in his eyes and voice, and scarcely aware that he had spoken at all. In a second they were all upon their feet, and the church was welcoming him home, as a victor from the war. They did not speak. Dr. Meynell was tempted to call for a triumphal hymn, but refrained, and the bishop led Bastian quietly to a seat. There he bowed his head on his hands, and after an instant lifted it and looked into the bishop's eyes. His hands were quite firm now, and his lips did not tremble.

"May I speak when you are finished?" he asked.

"You may speak now," said the bishop.

"No, I want to hear what else you have to say. I have been listening. I'll wait till you're through."

"Very well," said the bishop. He was thankful that there had been no emotional exhibition. He remembered how returning missionaries were greeted with shouts and song when he was a boy. Perhaps the world was growing less emotional and more sane. He was thankful also that Bastian knew that things were gone to pieces in Liberia. He should not have liked Forster's task of telling him. But Bastian seemed resigned enough. The bishop went slowly up the pulpit stairs. He could not remember just where he was when Bastian had interrupted him. Ah, yes, he was about to tell them that Roberts, too, was coming home.

"The cablegram from Mr. Roberts came yesterday to Secretary Forster, who forwarded it to me." The bishop took the telegram from his pocket and read it aloud. "Roberts cables that the girls' school is disbanded and the mission set on fire. We have done our best," he went on. "Lambert, Dana, Roe, Bastian have given their lives—" Then he halted at the sound of a loud cry.

"Bishop!" The bishop looked down. Bastian was struggling to his feet. "You mean that Roberts cabled that! That there is nothing there! That Roberts let it happen! That it is all gone! Gone, Bishop Jacoby?"

"I thought you knew, Bastian." Inexpressible pity made the bishop's voice falter. "I thought Forster went to meet you to tell you."

"No," answered Bastian thickly. "He did not tell me. I suppose he missed me in the crowd. I—I—" Bastian hesitated. The ague, the first sign of re-acclimatization, came over him again. "Let me speak now, Jacoby. I will not be long." The bishop, moved as he had not been for years, made way for him. "I—will not be long."

UPLIFTING CEYLON'S CHILDREN

"I DO not see how anything in the world could be more beautiful," said the late Phillips Brooks of the central part of the island of Ceylon, the island which is called

"The Gem of the Indian Ocean," and "The Pearl on the Brow of India." Around the coast the country is flat, and would be uninteresting but for the variety and beauty of its trees, and the splendid expanse of fields covered with gardens or with waving rice plants. In the central portion, however, the scenery is diversified and entrancingly beautiful. Mountains between six and seven thousand feet high rear their heads into the clouds, clothed from base to summit with luxuriant tropical vegetation. Streams of water, like threads of liquid silver, wind their way down the mountain sides and gurggle through the glades where the great tree ferns softly unroll their giant fronds. Lakes flash in the hollows of the hills.

The dense jungles are bright with the blossoms of innumerable tropical plants and creepers. Birds of brilliant plumage dart among the branches of the great forest trees, while strange animals and insects meet the eye at every turn.

Travelers, in visiting the central portion of the island, cannot fail to be charmed with the beautiful scenery, the brilliant hues of tropical vegetation, the waving palms, the balmy air, the silver moonlight flooding vale and hill. In the central part of the island many hillsides have, by the labor of generations, been cut into terraces. The water is conducted from terrace to terrace; and by this device rice, which can only grow in the standing water, can be cultivated upon the hillsides.

On the coast the climate is hot, but is cooler in the mountains. It is not considered unhealthful for Europeans, as the climate is extremely uniform owing to the surrounding sea. There are two seasons, the dry and the wet, whose coming and going is governed by the monsoon winds. The southwest monsoon blows from May to October, and the northeast monsoon blows from October to May. The rainfall in the south and north is small, but it is quite large in the mountains of the interior, especially on the southwestern ridges.

The island is one hundred and forty miles wide and about two hundred and seventy miles long.

The island has had a most romantic and interesting history. About 543 B.C., it is said, the Sinhalese came from Oude. They had a fair state of civilization and kept a record of their history. The Tamils came about three hundred years after and established themselves about Jaffna. Portuguese mariners discovered the richness of the country in the Middle Ages, and conquered it in 1513. They held it for a century or more, when it came into the possession of Holland. England took it in 1796, and in 1815 the last vestige of native rule passed with the fall of the Kandian kingdom.

Ceylon has a population of over three millions of people. There are many races: Tamils, Moormen, Burghers and Eurasians, Malays, Europeans, Veddas, and others. The principal religions are Buddhism, Hinduism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity. Demon worship prevails among the Buddhists and Hindus. In the darkest hours of life devil ceremonies are practised by the people, and their nominal religion is apparently forgotten.

The Hindus profess to worship three hundred and thirty million gods and goddesses, but they have no knowledge of a holy God; they have no knowledge of a God who desires his worshippers to be holy, and they have no knowledge of a God who is able to make his worshippers holy.

The first missionaries of the American Board, who arrived in Ceylon in 1816, opened work in the peninsula of Jaffna, which is in the northern province of the island. The people of that province are Tamils, and for the most part Hindus, being closely related in race and religion to the people of Southern India, their ancestors having come over from India about 200 B.C. They speak Tamil, which is the leading member of the Dravidian group of languages, and is spoken by fourteen millions of people in Southern India. The Dravidians were originally devil worshippers, and this form of religion still prevails. The Brahmans, however, centuries ago, engrafted their religion on the people, and one may see on every hand Hindu temples and devil shrines in close proximity, the same people worshipping in both.

As soon as the missionaries had acquired a working knowledge of the Tamil language, they began to translate the Gospels, and to preach. They found the majority of the people sunk in ignorance and superstition. Realizing that "the boy of to-day will be the man of to-morrow," and that if they could win the children for Christ they would have the men and women of the near future, they began to open schools for the children.

The people willingly allowed the boys to attend these mission schools; but when the missionaries expressed a desire to educate girls also, the people ridiculed the idea, saying: "What would be the use of sending a girl to school? A girl could never learn to read any more than a sheep." After two years of patient effort one of the missionaries succeeded in finding a girl whose parents were willing that she should be taught to afternoons in many of the village day schools, when the International Sunday School Lessons, translated into the Tamil language, are taught to the children. Many of the native Christians willingly act as teachers in these schools, not a few of them cheerfully walking long distances over the hot sand and under the tropical sun in order to perform this service.

From the mission vernacular and Anglo-vernacular village schools, the most promising pupils are received into the higher educational schools of the mission. The Oodoville Girls' Boarding School was one of the first mission boarding schools ever started in a heathen land for the higher education of girls. It was begun in 1824 by Rev. and Mrs. Winslow. One of the missionary ladies, Miss Eliza Agnew, was the principal of this school for forty-one consecutive years. During this time more than one thousand girls studied in this school. Miss Agnew was affectionately called by the people of Ceylon "the mother of a thousand daughters," for she had taken part in the training of three successive generations of Sinhalese girls, teaching the daughters, and even the granddaughters, of her original scholars. When she laid down her work it was found that of the more than six hundred girls who had graduated, taking the whole course, not one had returned unconverted to a heathen home. All who graduated went out as professing Christians.

A Christian Maid

The great need of the work in Ceylon at the present time is aid for the support of Christian teachers in the village schools.

In a recent letter, Rev. T. B. Scott, M.D., a prominent missionary in Ceylon, writes: "The work that presses hardest upon me is the maintenance and direction of our village schools. The Government gives us a 'grant-in-aid,' based on a yearly examination held by a Government inspector. This takes no account of Bible lessons and cannot be used for the teaching of such lessons. Neither can it be used for buildings.

"We receive a small grant from the Woman's Board for distinctively girls' schools. This provides us for help for twenty-five out of one hundred and twenty-seven schools.

"We must maintain these schools at a fixed standard or forfeit the Government grant, which would mean the loss of the school.

"We must try to find a way, somehow or other, for the maintenance of these schools. These village schools each form a centre in a village for evangelistic meetings and for a Sunday School. Furthermore, they are feeders to the high educational schools, from which come the teachers, evangelists and preachers. A gift of twenty-five dollars will provide the necessary support for a year for one of these village schools, in which from thirty to one hundred pupils are studying, and where they will receive a Christian training." Any one interested in the welfare of this work in Ceylon, should communicate with Mr. F. H. Wiggins, 14 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

Dr. Scott will gladly report from time to time the progress of these schools, and of the mission work in Ceylon, and those who support one of these schools can have the joy of knowing that they are partners with him in his work.

The Motto on the Sword

I am the owner of an officer's sword which was carried by my maternal great-grandfather in the Revolutionary War; by my grandfather, George Cloud, who was a captain in the Tenth U. S. Vol. Infantry, War of 1812, and which was loaned to Major H. L. Webb, who took it to the Mexican War. It has on one side in old-fashioned letters plainly to be seen, "God Bless the Provinces."

I think the motto, "In God We Trust" ought to be on our coins.

The educational work has steadily developed in the schools of the American Mission, until at the present time there are over ten thousand pupils under instruction in mission schools of all grades. Nearly one-fourth of these are girls.

In these schools 331 teachers are employed. The large majority of these are Christians and have been thoroughly trained for their work. In addition to the secular lessons, Scripture lessons and hymns are carefully taught. On Sunday mornings, Sunday schools are held in the mission churches and preaching places, and in the

For a moment after he was in the pulpit he could not speak. His eyes, however, held his audience until the shaking fit was past. Then, when he had begun, he hesitated, as though it were difficult properly to frame his sentences. Occasionally he used a word they did not know. It was many years since he had spoken to people of his kind, and the sentences came slowly, disjointedly, with long pauses between them.

"I do not agree with Bishop Jacoby when he says Africa should be given up. I think the reasons he gives are reasons why it should not be given up. Shall we leave the bones of Lambert and Dana alone there, uncared for, their work abandoned, their names forgotten because their work is forgotten? If they failed, it was partly because they had no help. I have come home to get some one to go back. We have about sixty girls and boys gathered together. We have never been so prosperous. We are not failing, we are succeeding." His hand stirred on the pulpit before him, and touched the yellow paper of the telegram. "I know what Roberts says. But I can build it up again in a month. He—he had no judgment. I warned him to be careful till I got back. They have to be treated like children." He spoke as tenderly as though they were his own. "You have to be there years before you can understand. They did that before once when I was sick. But they will come back. Because—because—"

He seemed to be struggling with inability to grasp his own thought, and the bishop helped with a gentle question.

"Why will they come back?"

"Because I can compel them."

"How?"

Bastian did not answer at once. Then he drew a long breath.

"I own them," he said simply.

"Own them!" The bishop expressed the horror on the faces of the eager listeners. They knew a slave trade still existed, but did the church hold slaves?

"Yes, I own them," answered Bastian steadily. "Not the church. I bought them with my salary. You don't understand how it is in Africa. I tried to explain once in a letter, but the board wouldn't listen. You can't get the free ones, but you can buy little girls that are—that are going to be—to be sold. They're very little girls, and they—they get fond of you, and you can teach them." He saw one man turn and whisper to another and answered him aloud. "I know all about Mary. We began with her too young, and she went back. But her children are there now. A generation doesn't count. We've only been there sixty years. And what are sixty years? or a hundred? or a thousand?" The Bible-trained men who listened answered in their hearts, "A watch in the night."

"But the fever," reminded the bishop gravely. In a minute they would be in the midst of one of the fervent missionary scenes of his childhood. The question of Africa had been decided, and the decision was not to be changed by Bastian's emotional appeal. "Is it worth while to train a man for years and then to send him where he will die in a week? You have a marvelous constitution. But Lambert only lived a year, and Dana two, and Roe one."

"They didn't take care of themselves properly. They didn't know then that native remedies are best."

"But Roe used native remedies."

"Roe did not die of fever," Bastian put his hand to his lips when he had spoken.

"Roe did not die of fever! But when you went out you found him—"

"Roe did not die of fever. He—he—" the ghastly secret he had kept for twenty years, for fear they should demand his return, was out at last. "Roe was murdered."

"By the natives?" It was a long time before the bishop asked the question.

"Yes. It was—before I got there. I found him. They said here they would waste no more lives in Africa. I knew they would think it was worse if he was murdered. It was—it happened days—before—I got there." His mouth seemed to stiffen so that he could not go on.

"Are they ever unruly now?" asked Dr. Meynell slowly. "Is your life ever in danger?"

"It—it has been." He would have given almost his hope of heaven to say no.

"Would it be if you went back?"

"Possibly."

"And you would go?" the bishop asked.

"I am going." Bastian faced his interlocutor steadily. "Shall they, Lambert and the others, be—" Bastian spoke with difficulty. "Shall they be left out there alone? Shall their lives be failures? And mine?"

"There would be plenty of work here."

Bastian shook his head wearily. "This is not my work. It is not my home. I tell you,"—he lifted his arms,— "whether the board sends me or not, I am going back. I came to get men because I am growing old, but I am going alone if no one will go with me. I am going back."

The bishop shook his head.

"But we can't ask any one to go there. It is the most dangerous spot along the coast. Let us try inland, perhaps, or farther south. We cannot ask any one to go there." He spoke a little impatiently. He was as sincerely interested in the church as Bastian. "We cannot, Mr. Bastian. Think of the lives and deaths of Lambert and Dana and Roe. Think of your own life."

Bastian stared at him dully. His own life! He did not like to remember it, the high hopes with which he had gone out, the finding of Roe's body, the terrors by night, the hard work by day, the loneliness, the mad longing for companionship, the evil desires which he had not known before, bred now by the jungle, desires which he cursed. Thank God he had conquered himself! Was the reward now to be forbidden him?

His gaze swept the faces before him. Some of them showed agreement with the bishop, some of them a wavering between two opinions, and all, pity for him.

"I am going back," he said slowly. "Is there no one who will go with me?"

The bishop started to rise, then sank back. For an instant Bastian held the eyes of the young home missionary who had recognized him when he came in, but presently they dropped. Beyond, his burning gaze searched in vain. He bent his head, defeated, ashamed. In his youth such an appeal would have brought a score of responses. To him now, this silence meant spiritual atrophy. To the bishop it meant that these people were at last sane. He bit his lips. The scene was becoming a nightmare. He half hoped that some one would offer to go, if only to put an end to the agony. Afterwards they could convince the candidates, if they could not convince Bastian, that it was not best. Then the bishop cursed himself for the meanness of the thought. A vast pity came over him for this zealot who was so anxious to throw away his life, and a feeling of thankfulness that he, the bishop, had sternly put down the fanatic enthusiasms of his own youth.

Then suddenly, as he watched, a change came into Bastian's haggard face. Light gleamed in his eyes, and into his cheeks came a redder flush. Bastian lifted his head, he put his hand to his trembling throat, and he smiled, the old radiant smile which was his one beauty. The bishop followed the direction of his gaze. To his amazement, then to his dismay and terror, he saw that Arnold had risen and was speaking. If it had been possible the bishop would have silenced the words upon the boy's lips; he would almost rather he had died. He was not

The Tramp Problem

ELIMINATION of the Tramp, by Edmond Kelly, M.A., F.G.S., sometime lecturer on Municipal Government at Columbia University, etc., is published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York City, price $1. The author proposes to abolish trampdom by the introduction of the Labor Colony System, as successfully carried out in Holland, Belgium and Switzerland, with such modifications as would be necessary to the adaptation of the system to American conditions. He holds that we have a duty to give a home to those who are worn out by our competitive system, "an obligation to those from whom civilization has taken the right to hunt for food, to pluck the fruits of the earth, to avail themselves of the natural methods for securing sustenance"; and such a home offering opportunities for labor, should not be regarded as either a charity or a correction. Scrutinize these starving men, as they file through the Bowery Mission for their midnight meal, and recognize that more than one-half of them are clearly self-respecting workingmen without employment; then feel that you have no right to a moment's rest so long as you remain a party to the indifference that fails to furnish work for these men."

Twenty Years in Siberia

TWENTY Years in Siberia and Leaves from my Russian Diary, is the title of a new volume by Baroness de Packh. This work of fiction shows in vivid colors the life story of a Russian peasant, who was convicted of a crime never committed by him. It tells of his deportation, his life in the Siberian mines, his coming to the United States, and his final vengeance on the high-born perpetrator of the crime which had unjustly been laid at his door. The ending, however, is in the true Christian spirit, leaving the revenge to Him who said, "Vengeance is mine," thus relieving the tension after a scene in which the real criminal is brought to bay for whose crime the innocent peasant has suffered. In Leaves from my Russian Diary, the authoress describes in her vivid style her own experiences in Russia. One thrilling incident is a ride through the forest, when she was chased by hungry wolves. A few poems from the pen of the Baroness conclude this book, which is most interesting throughout and one that cannot fail to fascinate many readers. Pages 200. Price $1.25. Guarantee Publishing Company, 4 West Twenty-ninth Street, New York City.

Classes to Teach Public Speaking

TO be able to speak in public—to express one's ideas clearly, simply and sensibly, in good grammatical language—is the desire of every intelligent man and woman. It is an accomplishment which, with little effort, may easily be brought within the general reach; yet few avail themselves of it.

We frequently see in church meetings, Christian Endeavor gatherings, prayer-meetings and social assemblies, many who shrink from the ordeal of standing upon their feet and taking part to the extent of uttering a few simple sentences. Their thoughts seem to fly from them instantly when they arise to speak, and the things they had been carefully turning over in their minds are forgotten. It is not timidity, nor ignorance, that troubles them, nor are they naturally halting in conversation. It is because they have not been trained, and know nothing of the few simple rules that would make of many a hesitating one of either sex a good, clear, logical speaker.

There are multitudes of men and women who could easily be trained to enrich the prayer-meetings of their churches, but many of whom are now silent because they think they cannot "speak in meeting." They have the ideas; but when they strive for utterance, the words refuse to come to their lips, and they feel their failure keenly.

There is fortunately a method of teaching which can correct this, and by which any clear-headed man or woman may become a very good speaker with little trouble. One of the best known public speakers in America to-day is the Rev. Emory J. Haynes, D.D., whose magnificent addresses filled the famous Tremont Temple in Boston with admiring thousands. Dr. Haynes has reduced the whole art of public speaking to a simple system or method, which he has applied, for a number of years, with remarkable success in training men and women in the art of clear and facile speech in public. The Haynes system is one that can be followed by intelligent pupils of either sex, young or old. To those who are looking forward to a professional career of activity, the course of training, under this system, could not fail to prove invaluable. It would develop in the individual the priceless gift of clear speech—a gift that needs only to be tested to be appreciated. To the young lawyer it will show the way to success, in pleading and in moving the minds of men; to the preacher, weary of viewing half empty pews, it will give the power to draw and hold audiences; and the merchant, the salesman and business man will appreciate its benefits. To wives and daughters it will reveal the rare secret of a charming and gracious manner of conversation an art so long neglected as to be now almost forgotten.

An opportunity is now afforded for readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who are desirous of acquiring the accomplishment of public speaking, to do so, and to take up an easy course of ten lessons, conducted personally by Dr. Haynes, which will bring them through all the difficulties and give all necessary information. Classes will open in a few weeks from this date, and all who desire to join, should send a postal card to Dr. E. J. Haynes, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, giving full name and address. A nominal fee, designed to cover the cost of the printing and postage, is exacted of each pupil, otherwise there are no charges. Dr. Haynes has consented to this arrangement for the benefit of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers and their friends, and it is hoped that a very large number will join these classes, in order that the benefits of this excellent course of lessons may be very widely diffused.

The Mikado for Peace

The twenty-fourth Diet of the Japanese Empire was opened December 28, in Tokio, by the Mikado in person with a speech which lasted only three minutes, but which was remarkable for its pacific tone. The Emperor laid stress on the increasingly cordial relations with foreign Powers and the important bearing on peace in the Far East of the entente cordiale concluded with Russia and France by Japan. He dwelt on the importance of the more careful deliberation of fiscal measures, and said he expected the concurrence of the Diet in the budget which would be presented by the Government. The message contained no reference to the immigration question.

RECIPE FOR AN UNHAPPY HOME

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

If people were willing to make an exhibit of their family skeletons and arrange them in a long row it might be found that there were very many unhappy homes even in a Christian community. We have in our former talks about the home spoken of it as a divine institution. We have called attention to the fact that it is an institution which has certain definite privileges and duties, and that it is the source of real influence for good or evil, and that as an institution it ranks ahead of the church and school. We have called attention to the fact that the father of the household is the high priest, and that any home which is not founded on the religious idea is liable to disruption. It will not be out of place now to call attention to the fact that for various reasons many homes which, to all outward appearances, should be happy, are not happy.

Suppose we write out a recipe for an unhappy home. We name as the first way of making an unhappy home: Start it wrong. Let the young man marry simply for looks; let the young woman get married for a social position; let both parties have in mind the allurements of rank or wealth. Let them be particular to leave God out, to leave him out of the courtship and out of the marriage, and then the supreme fact of love as the heart of the whole thing sinks into an insignificant place compared with the other inducements for entering into the marriage relation. Especially let the religious instinct and the religious feeling be reduced to a scientific minimum. This will insure an unhappy home life in almost every case.

The Road to Ruin

In the second place, after the home has been organized let the couple begin to live in an expensive manner. Especially let them go into debt for household furniture which they cannot afford to buy. Let the woman demand expensive articles of dress and expensive luxuries for the table. Let there be many social receptions and gay times, and after the honeymoon is over let the husband join a club and spend a good deal of his time there. This will add to the probability that in a few years the home will be unhappy or indifferent or useless or absolutely contrary to every true definition of a home.

Thirdly, into this recipe for an unhappy home put this ingredient: Let these two people made in the image of God, who were created to live to his glory, leave the church alone. Let them not assume any religious burdens or activities; never say grace at the table; if children come into this family they can be allowed to go to Sunday School if they desire, but let neither father nor mother ever make it a habit for the children to go. The main thing for the family providing for an unhappy home is to keep out of church life and away from church work; not know anything about religious heroism; take no religious newspapers; live in the world of the daily press, and of the novels and magazines of the times, and be very careful never to subscribe for anything which tells of the march of the kingdom of God in men's hearts. This will train the children up in ignorance of God and his kingdom, which will fit them in their turn to make unhappy homes.

In the fourth place, to insure an unhappy home no member of the family should have anything to do with reforms. Reforms mean burdens. Burdens mean weariness. Let us, if we desire an unhappy home, avoid burdens and weariness all we can. Let other people do what they will to clean up the municipality, elect good people to office, fight the saloon out of existence, guard the Lord's day in the name of needed rest and worship, and see to it that the devil does not get a hold on everything, and the church be shoved into a corner; but as for us and our house, we will serve ourselves. The people who are always reforming things are disagreeable; they are cranks and agitators. I wonder how many people who never go out of their lazy indifference and their criminal neglect of their own duty have reflected how much they owe to these "agitators." If no one had ever agitated for temperance we should have the saloon on our necks here; burden-bearing is to be avoided by the people who want to create in the end an unhappy home life. It may be very peaceable outwardly. It may contain in it all the elements of outward gayety, but any home which completely thrusts off its responsibilities for the reform of the world is an unhappy home.

Selfishness and Negligence

Fifth, to make an unhappy home let every day of this family begin with some act of selfishness. Let the man come down in the morning and read the morning paper at the table and ignore his children; let the woman complain of everything under heaven and on earth; let the Bible be covered up with the daily press. Let the man spend more for luxuries and needless habits throughout the day than he does for religious instruction. When night comes let the children run the streets as long and as late as they choose. Begin the day without God, and end it without God, and if this does not make an unhappy home in time I do not know what will.

Alongside this sharp position as outlines of absolute indifference to righteousness may be found all gradations in the homes of the people. Most of us probably would be shocked to lay down any such rule of life as that which has been embraced under these five heads, but the introduction of any one of them would be enough to create a serious trouble, the final result of which might easily be the dissolution of the family. After a dish has become cracked even a little, it takes only a little additional heat to crack it clear across until it breaks in two, and the unhappy homes of the world can certainly be accounted for without going into any philosophical reasons. We have already suggested what is true,—that is, that in the choice of life partners there are undoubtedly very many men and women who are what might be called not well-mated. The time of acquaintance, of courtship, has been perhaps comparatively brief. There has not been opportunity for a thorough understanding on the part of two people of each other's habits and tastes and characteristics. They become married, and in that relationship very soon learn things they had not dreamed of in regard to the characteristics, each of the other. Then comes

The Test of Married Life

Will it stand the test of this close and constant relationship, of this revealing of new characteristics, any one of which perhaps may not be agreeable? It is only fair to say that it will not stand the test unless there is mutual willingness to bear and forbear, to forgive, to wait, and to acknowledge the great fact that true love is a solvent for practically every trouble, and homes break down and families become disrupted because on one side or the other or both the heroism of love and the patience of love and the wisdom of love are not pushed to their heroic limits. We know there have been what seemed to be the most mismatched marriages which became in the end happy and useful.

It is no more than fair that in as much as we have given a recipe for unhappy homes, we should also give one for happy homes. The negative is never as strong as the affirmative. If we know how an unhappy home may be made we certainly know how a happy home can be made.

The first thing which must be put into the home is God. We have said this so often that it sounds like repetition. It is repetition. It is not new. It is as old as creation. It is trite; but in spite of that it is an eternal truth. Everything that is good for anything is old. So we say: A home must have God in it to insure its happiness.

Second: This home which starts with God should have a programme which is in the nature of daily convictions on the right kind of living. It should be laid down as a practical rule that simply having great quantities of things does not mean happiness. Simple habits of eating, simple habits of thinking, simple habits of philosophy where questions arise concerning the social demands of life are all in order in the happy home.

In the third place, our recipe for a happy home will always tie up the family to some kind of reform; that is, the real joyous life of the world must always have some contact with the heart of the world itself. We should like, if we consulted our own selfish inclinations, to cut ourselves off from the hard and disagreeable duties of making a better world. The fact is, a better world cannot be made unless somebody bears the cross; and I do not believe it is the Christian thing for any person or group of persons to decide that they will lead an easy, indulgent life and leave the other man to form some society or organization while they go their own ways.

Lifelong Love

In the fourth place, our recipe for a happy home includes of necessity the determination on the part of husband and wife to remain lovers as long as they remain alive. The love of courtship is a flickering candlelight compared with the noonday sun of a lifelong love.

Last of all, our recipe for a happy home goes back to the place where we started. The repetition of the same old, trite, worn, but eternal truth: love of God, love of men, faith in the eternal things—this lies at the heart of the blessed, happy home. With this divine seal upon it the family may expect to grow up and blossom out into the most beautiful organization ever known to mankind. There is, in the right sense of the word, no place on earth like home. It occupies the first place among the organizations of the world known to men. Its place can never be supplied by anything else. The home is a unique thing, and it will always occupy its unique place in the world.

May He who gives us this blessing help us in all wisdom so to build up our homes that they shall be every one of them happy abodes where God shall feel himself to be honored and welcomed every time the door is opened. "If any man lack wisdom let him ask of God, who giveth to all liberally," and in the wisdom which comes down from above let us build up our homes to reach even unto heaven; and when we have done our work here, when we have accomplished our destiny, let us not forget that for the children of God there is a home not made with hands, eternal in the heavens; for Jesus said, "In my Father's house are many mansions," or as we might translate it, "homes." "If it were not so I would have told you, for I go to prepare a place for you."

The Quality of Mercy*

OUR Lord's teaching differs from that of the teaching of the churches in the present day, in the emphasis he placed on character. A candidate for church membership now must show that his beliefs are correct, rather than that he is kind and gentle and helpful, if he desires to be accepted. When a clergyman is arraigned before his judges, the test he must meet is usually his belief in some recondite doctrine, rather than his treatment of the sick and the poor of his congregation. His usefulness may have been beyond praise, but if he has any doubt about the creeds, he is condemned. Christ did not follow this method. It was the Samaritan whose creed was heterodox that he praised, because of his kindness and benevolence. So here, the merciless servant who takes his fellow-servant by the throat is an abomination to the Saviour. The man's orthodoxy does not save him if he is cruel and merciless.

The threat that God will have no mercy on the merciless, ought not to be needed by any Christian. He should have no disposition to be cruel. If he has, he does not belong to Christ and has not his spirit though he be a deacon or an elder. The Christian is a man whose character is changed, who has become like Christ. None can mistake for a Christian the man who uses his power to injure another, who uses his capital to ruin another's business, who presses an obligation against an unfortunate debtor unnecessarily, who is vindictive against one who has done him wrong, or who is uncharitable to the fallen. The love that hopeth all things is not in him.

It is the consciousness of his position before God, in the past rather than in the future, that affects the Christian. He remembers how patient God has been with him, how forbearing and long-suffering he has showed himself in not discharging the unprofitable servant, that is a restraint on his own conduct. He becomes merciful as God is merciful, and loves much because he has been forgiven much. To the world Christ said, "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy"; but of his own people he expects the spontaneous exercise of mercy, which is exercised independent of threat or of hope of reward.

Wise Use of Time†

NOTHING surprises a man who has reached mid-life, more than the realization of the extent to which he has drifted. In business pursuits or in his studies he may have made a plan in his youth and have followed it; but his moral and spiritual character may have been influenced by his surroundings and his experiences to an astonishing degree. A moral lapse, or the influence of an associate, or a business disappointment, or family troubles draw him out of his course and send him in an entirely new direction. To a greater or less degree he resembles the wave of the sea, that James describes as "driven by the wind and tossed." Life seems to have slipped away under him.

A young man needs to understand this possibility. He should have a definite end and aim, and should keep them steadily in view. A new occupation, a new relation in life, a change of residence should be to him, not a matter of inclination or impulse, nor of the balancing of worldly advantages, but of how his chief end in life will be affected by the change. That he may make a mistake is possible. The thing that seemed to promise help and development may prove an obstacle. But what then? Shall he lie down and consider himself defeated? Shall he abandon his aim? Too many do that and, during the remainder of their lives, drift like a log on the sea. Should he not rather, perceiving that his life is in danger of shipwreck, put forth new energy that he may overcome the unexpected obstacle? A heavy loss comes to a young business man. If he is weak he bemoans it and takes refuge in the bankruptcy court. If he is strong, he reduces his expenses, studies the markets more carefully, curtails his purchases, takes more pains and works harder and eventually retrieves the disaster. The experience has been useful to him in developing his powers, as well as in saving his good name. Moral and spiritual progress comes in the same way. There are falls and stumbles, but it is how the man acts after them that shows his character. If he rises and resumes the struggle, weak and sore possibly, but determined, he will succeed. He will be saved from the saddening depressed feeling, at the end of his life, of having drifted and wasted his time.

The Unconquerable Hope

aware that another young man and another and another sprang up; he knew only that the impressions of the moment would remain with him, overshadowing all other impressions of life, until he died. There came, first of all, in one pang, the bitter loneliness of the coming years, accompanied by the knowledge that he had never been really acquainted with his boy; then a sharper stab of intolerable envy of these two men, Bastian and Arnold, one old, the other young, who, whenever they died, would die young, their lives "pouring in full torrent over a precipice," because of their mad devotion to an idea. He could not understand them, these nurses of unconquerable hope, Lambert, Dana, Roe, Bastian, even though there was added to them his own son, who said slowly, "I will go back with you to Africa."

Called Higher

Mrs. A. F. Ford, a noble Christian woman, who died lately at her home at Blue Mountain, Miss., had been a great sufferer for many years.

Mrs. C. W. Caffray, of Stockholm, N. J., passed to her reward December 23, 1907, aged fifty-nine years. She walked with God forty-six years. The Bible was her daily food and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD her most welcome visitor.

Mrs. S. VanDell, who passed away in Brooklyn, New York, recently, was a sincere Christian all her life and an old reader of this journal. She will long be remembered for her charity, and the beautiful influence of her home life.

Mrs. M. J. Hinman, a noble woman, was called home recently, at Blue Ridge, Peoria Co., Ill. She was a faithful member of the Congregational Church, and a noble Christian character who will be greatly missed.

Mrs. Harriet Asberry Keck passed from earth December 27 last, aged eighty-six. She was a reader of this paper for many years, also a faithful Christian since her childhood and member of the First Presbyterian Church of Greenville, Pa., for nearly sixty years.

Alfred Hill Avery, one of the most prominent business men of Gloversville, N. Y., passed away recently. He was the son of Rev. Royal A. Avery, and was born in Wallingford, Vt., in 1823. All his life he was a consistent Christian, an active church member, and a man of many Christian activities. He had many friends throughout the State. He was a reader of this journal for many years, and employed it to do missionary work by circulating it among his friends. Mr. Avery is survived by a daughter, Mrs. C. H. Silvernail, of Gloversville, and a son, Mr. W. J. Avery, of Troy, N. Y.

AN OLD NURSE

Persuaded Doctor to Drink Postum.

An old faithful nurse and an experienced doctor are a pretty strong combination in favor of Postum, instead of coffee.

The doctor said: "I began to drink Postum five years ago on the advice of an old nurse."

"During an unusually busy winter, between coffee, tea and overwork, I became a victim of insomnia. In a month after beginning Postum in place of coffee I could eat anything and sleep as soundly as a baby."

"In three months I had gained twenty pounds in weight. I now use Postum altogether instead of coffee; even at bedtime with a soda cracker or some other tasty biscuit."

"Having a little tendency to Diabetes, I use a small quantity of saccharine instead of sugar, to sweeten with. I may add that today tea or coffee are never present in our house and very many patients, on my advice, have adopted Postum as their regular beverage."

"In conclusion I can assure anyone that, as a refreshing, nourishing and nerve-strengthening beverage, there is nothing equal to Postum." "There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

from the town being nearly three miles above the sea level. In the summer season, which corresponds to winter in the North, the rains come and outdoor life is disagreeable, but no more so than during a rainy November or March in New York or Pennsylvania. In the winter months, such as July and August, frequently the thermometer drops just below freezing point and the streams are covered with a thin film of ice and the ground coated with hoarfrost, while the mountain-tops are covered with snow. At most seasons, the cheery open-grate fires in the homes of the Americans are very pleasant. Yet the climate is not a rigorous one—nothing like Chicago, for instance.

Of course, life at so high an altitude has its drawbacks, and there is a very definite limit to human activity. The most serious inconvenience is the soroche or mountain sickness. This is not simply the result of the rarified air which is experienced at high altitudes everywhere. By many authorities, soroche is held to be peculiar to the Andes and to be due to the exhalations of vegetable and mineral matter. Sometimes its manifestations are violent—intense headache, pain at the base of the brain, and extreme nausea. I was fortunate enough to escape with a mild attack. After reaching Cerro de Pasco I went to bed with a slight headache, which wore off in a couple of hours. Sleep, however, could not be coaxed, and this lack of sound slumber, with the consequent strain on the nerves, is what wears out most of the employees of the mining company, who have to remain for months at a time without the chance to change to the lower districts. Yet, in spite of the rarified atmosphere, they accustom themselves to pretty vigorous sports. Bowling is a favorite indoor amusement, and out of doors I saw several games of baseball in progress. When regular sports are held, a young American who has been in the district for five years usually wins the foot-races over the natives.

Within the last three years a great change has taken place in the means of reaching Cerro de Pasco. When the mines were discovered by an Indian shepherd in 1630, and they were worked for silver instead of copper, the only route was over a perilous trail. Yet the Spaniards soon had regular communication, the rich ore being brought down to Lima and the seaport, more than 200 miles, by pack trains composed of llamas, and later of donkeys and mules. This was the only means of transportation for nearly 250 years. Then Henry Meiggs, the American, by an arrangement with the Peruvian government, started in to build what is still the most wonderful railway in the world. This is the Central, or as it is better known, the Oroya Railway. It zig-zags up the mountain sides and through the canyons, by a marvelous series of switchbacks and tunnels, and crosses the Andes in the Galera tunnel at an elevation of 15,655 feet, or three miles above sea level. Nothing in the Alps or in the Rockies compares with the engineering triumphs of this railroad, nor, as I think, with the majesty of the Andine scenery.

After leaving Galera the railway runs down grade to Oroya, but not so much down grade, since the altitude in this place is more than 12,000 feet. From Oroya the American Mining Company has built a line to Cerro de Pasco, 85 miles in length, and it now is possible to leave Lima in the morning and reach Cerro the same night.

While Cerro, being so high up, is bleak and desolate, it is possible by a three hours' trip on mule-back to start down the continental divide toward the Amazon basin, and to look on the tropical vegetation of sugar cane, coffee, fruits and flowers, with broad rivers winding through fertile valleys and with a climate that is soft and sweet.

LIVING BREAD

By MRS. M. BAXTER

TO the Samaritan woman Jesus had said, "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst," and now he says, "I am the bread of life; he that cometh to me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst." God has so ordered it that he himself should be the Complement of man, and that man without him should be always unfilled, unsatisfied. A man's life without God is always on the stretch after an impossible something. Whether this hunger is the vain desire to know the future, like the ancient astrologists, whether it is the equally wild idea of an elysium by dividing up capital, there is a hunger, a need, a craving for something beyond, which God alone can satisfy. In the Church of God itself, how much there is of hunger which is unsatisfied—hunger for spiritual self-satisfaction, thirst for a conscious, felt holiness, for a power which can be gloried in, and which will carry all before it. But nothing of all this is Jesus himself.

When, however, we have taken him as our all in all, our life, and our bread to sustain that life, the source of all blessing, all power, all wisdom, all joy, the one resting-place of our hearts—when we cease to expect from ourselves or from others what only he can give, and what only he can be, then everything is changed; the old wretched hunger, the dissatisfaction with ourselves, with others and with everything, gives way to an intense, quiet, deep satisfaction in him. The circumstances may be all wrong, but he controls them; we ourselves may be all wrong, but he who is with us is at hand to put all right; we may be perplexed, but perfect Wisdom is Maker of the situation, and we cannot have the old despair while we are believing in him for all.

The people said to Jesus, "Give us this bread." "I am the bread of life," he answered; "but I said unto you, That ye also have seen me, and believe not. All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." Here are the two sides—the secret of his own whom the Father has given to him, known only to him and his Father, but also the open declaration, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." We have only to do with the latter, and to rejoice and praise him that none who come to him, whatever the errand on which they come, will be cast out. And this is his Father's will as much as his, "For I came down from heaven," he says, in reference to this very thing, "not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me."

There are many who will come to a meeting, or come to talk with Christian friends, or come to read a religious book, who yet do not come face to face with God. But the promise is, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out," and "He . . . shall never hunger."

Our blessed Lord goes on to show how the bread which God sent from heaven to his people in the desert only sustained natural life. "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead." But there is a life which the death of the body cannot touch, which is eternal as God's own life. "He that believeth on me hath everlasting life."

You Ask Me

YOU ask me how I gave my heart to Christ?
I do not know. [ago,
There came a yearning for him in my soul so long
I found earth's flowers would fade and die—
I wept for something that could satisfy;
And then—and then—somehow I seemed to dare
To lift my broken heart to him in prayer.
I do not know—I cannot tell you how;
I only know he is my Saviour now.

You ask me when I gave my heart to Christ?
I cannot tell. [well,
The day, or just the hour, I do not now remember
It must have been when I was all alone
The light of his forgiving Spirit shone
Into my heart, so clouded o'er with sin;
I think—I think—'twas then I let him in.
I do not know—I cannot tell you when;
I only know he is so dear since then.

You ask me where I gave my heart to Christ?
I cannot say. [terday,
That sacred place has faded from my sight as yes—
Perhaps he thought it better I should not Remember where. How I should love that spot!
I think I could not tear myself away.
For I should wish forever there to stay.
I do not know—I cannot tell you where;
I only know he came and blessed me there.

You ask me why I gave my heart to Christ?
I can reply:
It is a wondrous story; listen while I tell you why.
My heart was drawn, at length, to seek his face;
I was alone, I had no resting-place;
I heard how he had loved me with a love
Of depth so great—of height so far above
All human ken; I longed such love to share,
And sought it then, upon my knees in prayer.

You ask me why I thought this loving Christ
Would heed my prayer?
I knew he died upon the cross for me—
I nailed him there.
I heard his dying cry, "Father, forgive!"
I saw him drain death's cup that I might live;
My head was bowed upon my breast in shame!
He called me—and in penitence I came.
He heard my prayer! I cannot tell you how,
Nor when, nor where: only—I love him now.

Bryan on Foreign Missions

HON. WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN delivered an address in the old historical Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., recently, on the subject of "Foreign Missions." He enumerated the principal objections that are raised against our sending missionaries to foreign and heathen lands, and then proceeded to answer those objections. On his trip around the world, he had visited many places where we have missionaries, and he had witnessed the good work that is being done by them.

Buddhism, Mohammedanism and Confucianism had not progressed in the last two thousand years. In one matter, however, the Mohammedan religion excels our own, and that is, it gets the men out to worship, while in our country, about 75 per cent. of the men do not attend church services.

Mr. Bryan maintains that the signs indicate that the entire world is progressing and growing better materially, politically and morally. Illiteracy is decreasing in every country in the world, and the people in Japan, and even in Russia and China, are demanding more popular forms of government, which is, of course, an indication of advancement and improvement.

Admires the Red Letter Bible

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Yesterday morning I had the pleasure of receiving your free and generous gift, and I am fervently thankful to God for enabling his international servants in New York to reproduce the precious volume in such queenly covering and plates of instructive information. What a blessed contrast to the time in the eighteenth century, when a Dublin publisher was compelled to have a subscription list to encourage him to engage in the same work, in which I rejoice to say my grandmother's name, Jane Armstrong (friend and co-worker in Ireland with Rev. John Wesley), and the names of her sons, Newcomen and John, my father, appear.

BRAIN POWER

Increased by Proper Feeding.

A lady writer who not only has done good literary work, but reared a family, found Grape-Nuts the ideal food for brain work and to develop healthy children. She writes: "I am an enthusiastic proclaimer of Grape-Nuts as a regular diet. I formerly had no appetite in the morning and for 8 years while nursing my four children, had insufficient nourishment for them."

"Unable to eat breakfast I felt faint late and would go to the pantry and eat cold chops, sausages, cookies, doughnuts or anything I happened to find. Being a writer at times my head felt heavy and my brain asleep."

"When I read of Grape-Nuts I began eating it every morning, also gave it to the children, including my 10 months old baby, who soon grew as fat as a little pig, good nature and contented."

"Within a week I had plenty of breast milk, and felt stronger within two weeks. I wrote evenings and feeling the need of sustained brain power, began eating a small saucer of Grape-Nuts with milk instead of my usual indigestible hot pudding, pie, or cake for dessert at night."

"Grape-Nuts did wonders for me and I learned to like it. I did not mind my house work or mother's cares, for I felt strong and full of 'go.' I grew plump, nerves strong and when I wrote my brain was active and clear; indeed, the dull head pain never returned."

"GRANDMA HILL'S" WAY

THERE is a kindly-faced old lady in Emporia, Kan., who is noted for her benefactions. Her whole life is spent in behalf of others, and in good works. Mrs. Julia A. Hill might even be said to lead the list of philanthropists in this and other countries, for while they give munificently of their millions, Mrs. Hill gives literally her all.

"Grandma Hill," as she is known to her friends, is eighty years old, and was born in Mechlinburg, Pa. She has been a widow for fourteen years and lives alone in a tiny three-room cottage. This house is owned by a son of the old lady, and she lives in it rent-free. Her sole income is from a small property which she owns in another State. Interested friends have arranged that she can draw from this only a stipulated portion at

The old lady's rooms furnish an interesting study. They are filled with little mementoes from admiring friends, always given with the laughing stipulation that "you keep this." The furniture is of the plainest and astonishingly changeable in character, for never a piece remains with Grandma, if she finds some one needing it worse than she does. Once she tore up the ingrain carpet from her own floor to give it to a needy neighbor. In its place is perhaps the most wonderful floor covering ever seen, for it is made of small scraps of various patterns of ingrain carpet put together patch-work fashion. It supplies warmth, and Grandma treads it as complacently as though it were Brussels.

Like Carnegie, Mrs. Hill is terribly afraid of dying possessed of property, and is trying to devise means to avoid that "disgrace."

A Centenarian Preacher Dead

REV. ANGUS JOHNSON, the oldest minister of the Southern Presbyterian Church, died at Avalon, Texas, recently. He was in his one hundredth year, and was probably the oldest minister in this country. A member of the Presbytery of Dallas, he continued to supply his charge at Avalon until a short time before his death.

He was born in Robeson County, N. C., but moved to Cheraw, S. C., at the age of fifteen, and soon after united with the Presbyterian Church. At nineteen he was received by Harmony Presbytery as a candidate for the ministry. In 1838 he was ordained to the full work of the ministry by Fayetteville Presbytery and installed pastor of Philadelphia and Union Churches, N. C. In 1843 he organized the church at Water Valley, Miss., and served as its pastor until 1860, in connection with the Sand Spring and Centreville Churches. From 1860 to 1870 he was pastor of the Philadelphia, Hudsonville and Spring Creek Churches in Mississippi. Thence he went to Tennessee and was pastor of Rocky Mount and Ebenezer Churches for nine years. He next served the Dunedin and Johnson Lake Churches in Florida for three years.

Removing to Texas in 1886, he became pastor of the Avalon Church, and served it until his death. During the past twenty years he organized several churches in Ellis County, and supplied them most of the time, together with the Avalon charge, which required long rides through the country.

Mr. Johnson was in active service as a minister for seventy-two years. A remarkably vigorous man, he never passed the "dead line." In 1906 he and his wife visited the Southern General Assembly at Greenville, S. C., and were enthusiastically received. A few weeks later he made the address at the seventieth anniversary of the organization of the church at Cheraw, S. C. He leaves two children and his second wife. His death followed only two or three weeks after that of his nephew, Rev. Dr. Josephus Johnson, pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Austin, Tex., who had bequeathed to his uncle a substantial sum for his remaining days.

intervals, lest she give the whole away at once, and so come to want.

Like Margaret, of New Orleans, Grandma Hill spends nothing for clothing for herself. She supplies her needs in that line from the "rag rags" which people send in to her, knowing her liking for rag-making. She sets aside $25 each year for table expenses, and holds herself strictly to this limit, which is eked out by the vegetables from her small garden plot, which she herself is still able to cultivate.

"Bless you, I am not poor," laughs the dear, sunny old lady; "I feel so rich! I read the other day that wealth is having all that you need. I have everything I need, everything," emphasizing the assertion lest it should be doubted.

"The giving," she continued. "Oh, I love to give, so I deserve no credit for doing it. It's second nature, and I couldn't help giving to save my life. I have always given even when a child. My mother trained me to it."

Mrs. Hill has several pet philanthropies, among them various orphan's homes and Crittenden homes, foreign missions, the Bowery Mission Bread Line and Prohibition work. To these she gives the larger part of her yearly income, in sums varying from $10 to $25. Much of her giving is done through the agency of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, though to some causes she sends direct.

Almost every day of the week, except Sunday, and far into the night, she may be found sorting, cutting and sewing, knitting her rugs and piecing comforters. Until recently, she has never kept track of the amount accomplished. Within the past five years, she has made and sent to orphan asylums and like institutions nearly three hundred rugs and twenty-five comforters. Two years ago, she dried seventy pounds of fruit for "her orphans." Only those who have ever dried fruit can know the amount of work this entailed. Besides these things, she makes and sends scrap-books and various trifles for entertainment or utility. She packs her own boxes, and prepaies charges on all that she sends—an example to the charitably inclined.

Two Hundred and Fifty Good Old Songs

This volume contains the words and music of the choicest gems of the old and familiar songs we used to sing when we were young. The singing of these songs will not only "drive dull care away," but bring new and continued happiness and cheerfulness into every home which it enters. It has been arranged with great care and we have no hesitation in saying that it is the best book of the kind published. Read the following partial Table of Contents. The book contains 250 Songs, including the ones mentioned here, and would cost several dollars if in sheet music form.

In the Starlight When You and I Were Young, Annie—Battle of Bunker Hill—Black-eyed Susan—Killarney—Speed Away, Speed Away—Come Back to Erin—Where's Rosanna Gone?—Spring, Gentle Spring—The Maiden's Prayer—Old Dan Tucker—Old Fiddler—My Bible Leads to Glory—When I Can Read My Bible—The Star of Bethlehem—Fill Hang My Harp on a Willow Tree—Old Tubal Cain—Sing, Sweet Bird—Molly—Put the Kettle on—We're a Noddy—My Mother's Bible—Where Was Moses When the Light When Out?—Come Home, Lather—The Danube River—By the Blue Atlantic Mountains—Hickory, Hickory Dock—Take Back the Heart—Old King Cole—The Old Oaken Bucket—Home, Sweet Home—Star Spangled Banner—Had I Columbia—Canaan—Comin' Thro' the Rye—Robin Adam—Annie Laurie—When the Swallows Homeward Fly—Ben Bolt—Uncle Ned—Rock a Bye Baby—Seaside Cottage—Kind Words Can Never Die—Little Buttercup—The Boat That Brought Me Home—Wayne—Columbia, Gen. of the Ocean—Marseillaise Hymn—Paddle Your Own Canoe—Kathleen MacAvonney—Don't You Go, Johnny—Up in a Balloon—Ring on, Sweet Angelus—Soldier's Farewell—Johnny Morgan—Nancy Lee—Man in the Moon—Billy Boy—Bell o' Baltimore—My Heart with Love is Beating—Our Flag is There—My Little Wife and I—Over the Garden Wall—Let Me Dream Again—Do They Think of Me at Home?—When the Band Begins to Play—The Year Has Passed—Within a Mile of Edinboro Town—Good-Bye, Charlie—I Wish You Well, etc., etc.

This well-made book of 128 pages, containing the above list of songs and many others, more than 250 in all, words and music, in attractive Colored Covers, will be sent by mail postpaid together with The Housewife and the rest of this year for only 25 CENTS. The Housewife has been published for nearly 25 years. It comprises from 20 to 32 pages each issue, is printed on good paper and is clean, bright, timely, full and always interesting. Our complete and serial stories are of good moral tone, are written by first-class authors and are a special and attractive feature. Departments are devoted to The Kitchen, Fancy Work, The Home Nook and The Social Circle. The latter department is, as one subscriber writes, "As good as a visit from one's friend." We believe that there is room in your home for The Housewife and know that you will enjoy its visits when once you become a reader. There is no other paper just like it and if you pay a dollar a year you cannot get any better reading matter. On receipt of only 25 cents we will send The Housewife on trial and the 250 Good Old Songs as above described. We guarantee complete satisfaction or your money back. Send by P. Questions and Answers

L. A. T., Westminster, S. C. Is it possible that Judas could have been forgiven and admitted to heaven, seeing that he repented?

No man has the right to pronounce in these matters. God alone has the prerogative. To us, judging by the Scriptures, it seems impossible that Judas could have been forgiven, but his doom was in God's hands. Jesus is represented as calling him "the son of perdition" (John 17: 12). There is little doubt that he was amazed and was stricken with consternation, when he saw that Jesus was submissive at his arrest. Judas evidently expected that he would deliver himself by his miraculous power and would become a king. He probably had no idea that he was sending Jesus to his death. Hence his remorse when he saw that his plot had failed.

G. H., Detroit, Mich. When were the different members of the Supreme Court of the United States appointed?

Chief Justice Melville W. Fuller, of Illinois, was appointed in 1888. The Associate Justices as follows: John M. Harlan, in 1877; David J. Brewer, 1889; Edward D. White, 1894; Rufus W. Peckham, 1895; Joseph McKenna, 1898; Oliver W. Holmes, 1902; William R. Day, 1903; William H. Moody, 1906. They were appointed by the Presidents who were in office at the dates given. The question you sent in regard to their religious affiliations you should send to the judges themselves.

F. P. W., Los Angeles, Calif. 1. Does it not please God as well if each member of a family kneel at the bedside before retiring and offer prayer, as to have family prayer in the usual way when one or more of the family cannot be present? 2. Is it right to advertise in a Sunday paper or hang out a business sign on the Sabbath day? 3. Is it not just as wrong to buy on the Sabbath day as it is to sell?

1. Family prayers in the good old-fashioned way, with all the available members present, is the best. It promotes the spirituality of the entire household as nothing else can. 2 and 3. The day is the Lord's and no business should be done on that day, either personally or by other agencies.

A. B., New York City. Please give list of principal wars and pestilences of the last century.

Napoleonic wars, 1800-1815; United States and England, 1812-1815; Greek Independence, 1821-1828; Mexican War, 1846-1847; Crimean, 1854-1856; Italian, 1859; United States Civil War, 1861-1865; Seven Weeks' War of 1866, Prussia defeats Austria; Franco-Prussian, 1870; Russo-Turkish, 1877; Chinese-Japanese, 1894-1895; Spanish-American War, 1898; South African War, began 1899, ended 1902. Pestilences: In the East, 1800; Spain, 1804-1805; Asiatic cholera in Great Britain and in England again, in 1848-1849; cholera in Constantinople, Paris, Naples; new disease in Dublin in 1866; plague in Astrakhan, yellow fever epidemics in South and in Cuba.

J. G. C., of Manchester, N. H., kindly sends the following in regard to a recent question:

Old Subscriber, of Omaha, Neb., asks you what is the meaning of the name Connecticut. The Indian name is Kwenitewog, Long River. I think there is no pine in it. The English used the letter "Q" and the French the letter "K," and it finally came to the use of the letter "C." Pine was "Coa" in English and "Koa" in French. The Indian name in local term for Connecticut was Kwenitewog, which meant "At the long river."

C. P. A., Centerville, Mo. 1. What is the wealth of the United States, England, Germany, Russia, Italy, France, Austria, Hungary? 2. How long will the Panama Canal be? 3. Who is President of Panama? 4. Where does Andrew Carnegie live?

1. The wealth of the United States is $116,000,000,000; Great Britain and Ireland, $62,200,000,000; Germany, $42,800,000,000; Russia, $35,000,000,000; Italy, $13,000,000,000; France, $42,800,000,000; Austria-Hungary, $20,000,000,000. 2. The Panama Canal will be forty-six miles long. 3. The President of Panama is Manuel Amador Guerrero. 4. Mr. Carnegie divides his time between Scotland and New York.

Several Readers. The Esperanto Text Book, which will be found exceedingly serviceable as the Course of lessons advances and pupils make progress, will be supplied by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at 50 cents post paid. The Primer and Vocabulary will be sent post paid, at 10 cents each.

H. G., Markleysburg, Pa. Is a man born of God in this life or not until the resurrection?

There is no reason in the Bible for supposing that the new birth is postponed to the resurrection. The Apostle John is very emphatic on the subject. He says (I. John 3: 2), "Behold now are we the sons of God." Paul agrees (Gal. 3: 26); "For to dig the well, as there is plenty of water in the valley. Its being done tends to confirm the tradition. Such a man as Jacob, with large flocks, may have felt it wise to have a well of springing water on his own land to avoid such disputes as his father Isaac had. (See Gen. 26: 19-23.)

Reader, Woodbine, Ill. 1. Is it right for people who profess Christianity to mingle with those who indulge in wrong amusements? 2. Should Christians accept invitations to card parties and dances? 3. Is it right to have entertainments in church to keep the worldly in the house of God? 4. Should we keep asking those who are unconcerned and worldly to come to the house of God?

1. They may mingle with them for a good purpose, but not to countenance or share in their amusements. 2. Certainly not. 3. There are entertainments that are suited to church work and others that are not. To cater to the worldly in a worldly spirit would be wrong. To attract them may have been so, but there is no basis in the Gospels for the contention. Paul speaks (Gal. 1: 19) of "James, the Lord's brother." The expression "till," in Matt. 1: 25, implies that Joseph and Mary lived together as husband and wife. 2. It was apparently a mere custom, a contribution of the Roman government to the joy of the public festival. The subject people were conciliated by concessions of this kind, as kings grant an amnesty on some public celebration.

Apropos of Sunday traveling, Mrs. W. W. Carter, of Galt, Canada, writes:

I should be delighted to show you several Canadian cities of from ten to fifty thousand inhabitants where Sunday street cars are unknown. I should also be pleased to have you peruse our new Lord's Day Act, which forbids Sunday street cars on all lines, except those which had the privilege before this act came in force.

Mrs. O. E. S., Jewell City, Kan. Is it right for the ladies of a church to earn money for church purposes?

Provided they earn it in a proper manner, as we have no doubt would be the case, there can be no objection. We think you did a very laudable thing in earning money and giving it to improve the Lord's house.

Reader, Pleasant View, Va. 1. Who is the author of "green-eyed monster"? 2. What is meant by the "Brownies" in The Brownies Around the World?

1. The phrase, "green-eyed monster," is used by Shakespeare in The Merchant of Venice and again in Othello. 2. A brownie is a "house spirit," according to old superstitions. In England he was called Robin Goodfellow. It is an old-time fairy fancy.

Children of twelve years can join, as the study of Esperanto is simple, and is a great aid in the better understanding of English grammar. All you need is the course of lessons in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which you may supplement with a Primer and Vocabulary costing ten cents each.

W. M. W., Wakefield, Kan. 1. The "Hegira" which means "going away" was the flight of Mohammed and his followers from Mecca, July 16 or September 13, 622 A.D. 2. Mohammed never went to Jerusalem. His wars were chiefly in Arabia. Caliph Omar took Jerusalem in 637 A.D. (five years after the death of Mohammed), defeating the Persians, who had captured it twenty-three years earlier. 3. A Turk is a native of Turkey proper. Ottoman is any subject of the Grand Turk, or anything that relates to, or is characteristic of, the Turks or their government. Mussulman, Mohammedan and Moslem are synonymous words and mean a believer in the Mohammedan faith. Thus, a man may be an Arab or a native of India, or an Afghan, or an African, and still be a Moslem, whereas, to be a Turk, he must be a subject of Turkey or some Ottoman dependency.

The Picturesque "Castle Rock," Colo.

CASTLE ROCK is a county seat in Colorado, so named from a picturesque rock on a high elevation. The photograph is forwarded by Mrs. Anna V. Whittier, a reader of this journal. West of the town looms the mountain range, resting, as it seems, its southern extremity against that towering and snow-clad buttress, Pike's Peak. Adjoining the limits of the city is the famous Castle Rock, towering as a giant, 7,219 feet above sea level, and 1,000 feet above the city, on the summit of which the tourist may drink in the scenic beauties of Colorado, viewing, far below, and for miles and miles in every direction, a luxuriant country, dotted with cultivated fields, with occasional rugged or picturesque elevations in the form of "buttes." From the south flows Plum Creek, a mountain stream, supplying the city with pure water. Castle Rock has many attractions for the tourist.

ye all are the children of God." Jesus in his talk with Nicodemus (John 3: 3) said, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." It is also stated (John 1: 12), "As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God."

J. B. Rayner, of Calvert, Tex., writes announcing the formation of a Texas Law and Order League, the objects of which he states as follows:

To suppress crime and to socially ostracize the lazy, the immoral and criminal of my race, and to encourage my race to strive for virtue and toil in self-denial to own a farm home, and become producers of human necessities. To teach a reverence and love for law. To persuade my people to leave the towns and cities and live on farms. To encourage and foster industrial training and to teach domestic service.

L. S. O., San Diego, Calif. Is there any Scriptural authority for the statement in the Sunday School Lesson that Jacob dug the well by which Christ sat (John 4: 6)?

No, the tradition is very ancient, but the narrative of Jacob's life in Genesis contains no mention of his digging the well. There is a record of his buying the land (Gen. 33: 18-20), and a passing mention of a well there (Gen. 49: 22), but no direct statement. The curious thing about it is that it should have been deemed necessary by proper means, such as illustrated lectures, concerts, etc., is right. The line should be rigidly drawn against improper entertainments. 4. By all means. It is our duty to do so and to awaken them to the vital truths of the Christian religion.

A. H. N., Des Moines, Ia. How many people were killed in the Deerfield, Mass., massacre, February 28, 1704?

There were about forty killed by the French and Indians, and one hundred taken prisoners. Many of the latter died while being taken to Montreal. Some of the prisoners were exchanged and returned home. You can get full information by writing for the little booklet printed by the curator of Memorial Hall, Deerfield, Mass.

M. W. C., Petersburg, Ill. 1. Did Mary, the mother of Christ, have any other children besides him? 2. Why was a prisoner released to the Jews at Passover?

1. The people of Nazareth, where Jesus was brought up, said so (Matt. 13: 55, 56) and mentioned the names of four brothers and referred to his sisters. Mark also mentions them (6: 3). The attempt to hold Mary up to extreme reverence has led to an effort to make these out to be the cousins of Jesus, or the half brothers, children of Joseph by a former wife. They

THE GOSPEL IN THE MOUNTAINS

It is the Only Hope for the Transformation of the Kentucky Feudists of the Cumberland Range

THE dreadful tragedy at Jackson, Ky., recently, in which a leading citizen was killed by his only son, has again attracted the attention of the whole country to Breathitt County, known as "Bloody Breathitt."

When a soldier, I several times crossed this county and served in the army with many of its sons. For twenty-five years I have traveled all over it, preaching the Gospel, and have some knowledge of its people.

Breathitt is a large county in the Kentucky Cumberlands, lying on the north and middle forks of the Kentucky River. The mountains lie en masse, and not in ranges, like the Southern mountains, so that the valleys are narrow and tortuous. The people live along these narrow valleys. The only cereal raised is corn, and not enough of that to feed the 15,000 people who live in it. The lack is supplied by logging principally, and digging medicinal roots, and, with some, stock and coal. One railroad, the Lexington and Eastern, reaches Jackson, the county seat, some one hundred miles from the Blue Grass capital.

When I first visited this county as an evangelist, over twenty years ago, there was not a church in it of any kind, and not a regular preacher. I preached in the courthouse at Jackson and organized the first church there. The village had no schoolhouse and no house of worship. The county was then known as "Bloody Breathitt," on account of deadly feuds, in which it is said over a hundred men had been killed. There had been a reign of terror following the war. The differences were largely political.

The State of Kentucky sent distinguished judges, under escort of a heavy guard, to stop the feuds. The Synod of Kentucky pushed its work of preaching the Gospel of peace, organizing and building churches and placing educated and consecrated ministers in the county to teach the people. They found the people ready and willing and even anxious to hear. Six churches were organized in different sections of the county, large congregations gathered and houses of worship built. A different order of things started. The Synod established an institution of learning at Jackson, which has grown to be one of the largest and best in the State, numbering hundreds of students, who are instructed in every branch of learning, both literary and mechanical. A handsome new brick church succeeded peaceful and prosperous in the State. It is a local option county.

One may ask, Why this reign of terror? The reply is not so easy to give. First of all, I believe, it is due largely to illicit selling of whisky, or the sale of it under government license. Most of the murders may be traced to this prolific source of crime. Probably bad feeling over political differences is responsible for part of the troubles. The mountain people are largely related to each other by blood or marriage. Few of them ever emigrate. They are clannish, like most highlanders. When you strike one, you strike the whole family and connection, and all resent it. Law is slow and lax in its administration, so the people take it into their own hands. But the crying cause back of all this violence and bloodshed is the want of religion, the want of the Gospel of peace, and forgiveness and love.

People must be educated to value human life, to obey God's laws, to live peaceable and sober lives. This is what some of God's people are trying to do. It is a big undertaking and cannot be accomplished at once. Character cannot be changed like clothes. This is the humble endeavor of the Society of Soul Winners, the America Inland Mission. This year it had twenty-one faithful missionaries teaching the children a Gospel of peace and good-will. Most of the religious work now carried on in the county outside of the frame one which was burned. The Methodists built a nice frame church, and the Baptists a brick. The town has grown in the twenty years from a village of some 200 to a well-built town of nearly 2,000, with fine brick business houses, courthouse, hotels and residences.

Twenty years ago I rode there horseback, over some seventy-five miles of bad mountain roads. Now three railroads enter the town; one from Lexington and two from neighboring counties. For years after the advent of the church, the county was among the most orderly,

Jackson (the county seat), is done by the Soul Winners. New missions are being opened, new churches built, new schools organized, and a college just completed. In all these enterprises the people have given their earnest co-operation.

The Breathitt people are not heathen nor barbarous. There is not in all my knowledge a kinder, braver, gentler people naturally. They are the soul of hospitality. They have their faults, like others, and are

THE AMERICAN PULPIT

A SERMON BY
Rev. F. DeWitt Talmage, D.D.

Right and Wrong Allegiance

TEXT: I. Samuel 16: 1—"How long wilt thou mourn for Saul?"

WHO has not read with thrilling interest Sir Walter Scott's story of Jeanie Deans? I was much interested in learning that the heroine of that story was a real character, a girl who lies buried near Dumfries, on whose tombstone is an epitaph written by Scott himself. It is impossible to refrain from tears as we read the story. The girl, whose life is wrapped up in that of her young sister, gives evidence against her that convicts her of a capital offense, and then walks all the way to London to obtain a pardon for her. The brave girl could not tell a lie, even to save her sister from a shameful death, but could undergo hardship to deliver her. That is heroism, the heroism of a fine soul that loved intensely but feared to sin. Few of us could have done a thing so heroic. We try to shield our loved ones. We shrink from exposing them. We sometimes shrink even from reproving them, lest we cause them pain. We try to shield and cover up their wrong-doings, even as you sometimes see a foolish mother shield from her husband the wrong-doings of her prodigal son, because she is afraid the father might punish the boy.

Useless Regrets

It was in this way that Samuel clung to his protege, Saul. Most of us think of Samuel as a stern-faced, grim-visaged mentor to the young king. We picture him standing before the offender implacable as a Goddess of Justice, with blinded eyes, holding high the scales, and ready without a particle of personal regret to execute the sentence when the scales indicate guilt. But underneath this stern-set, iron-muscled countenance of Samuel was a heart of deep, tender, faithful love. Though he must denounce Saul's sins, he could not cease to love Saul. His heart seemed to cling to Saul, and he would have been glad, had it been right, to cover up Saul's misdeeds. Thus in the text the Lord finds the old prophet, and says practically this: "Samuel, how long are you going to grieve for Saul? He has done wrong. Are you going to continue to stay at home and grieve? Are you not going forth to try to rectify the evil Saul has done? Come, Samuel, be a man. Be brave and true to your nobler and better self. Come, I have selected another king for Israel." As God came to Samuel in times of old, God is coming to us and bidding us refrain from useless grief.

In the first place, you must remember that Saul was a handsome man. He was not only a king by election, but he was one of those wonderful men who are described as every inch a king because of their physical presence. He was not only tall, standing head and shoulders above all his companions, but he was perfectly formed. And his face in its beauty must have looked like the features chiseled out of marble by Phidias to form the beautiful countenances of Greek gods. His bearing, when he first came before Samuel, was so humble and pure that, even in the eyes of the stern-faced prophet, nothing was to be criticized, nothing was to be apprehended.

Justice Deflected by Beauty

Saul had the refinement in his make-up which came from a cultured life. He was the son of one of the representative men of his tribe. His blood was of the best. He walked with the conscious gait of one well-born, who was a natural leader among men. His ancestors for generations had been great men. If you turn to the record, you can read these words: "Now there was a man of Benjamin, whose name was Kish, the son of Abiel, the son of Zeror, the son of Bechorath, the son of Aphiah, a Benjamite, a mighty man of power. And he had a son whose name was Saul, a choice young man and goodly; and there was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person to look upon than he: from his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people." Can you not see Saul moving along, the cynosure of all eyes? Cannot you see him, handsome as an Apollo Belvedere? Was it any wonder that Samuel the prophet should love him and hate to give him up? It is so easy to excuse the sins of a man and a woman when they are beautiful and graceful. But because Saul the handsome man was a sinner, was that any reason why his sins should not be condemned by God?

Take for instance the life of Mary, Queen of Scots. There is a lot of maudlin sentimentality expended over that sinful life. But was not John Knox right when he used to stand up in the Scottish pulpit and denounce her profligacies in plain words? And should not scores and hundreds of our women to-day in social life be denounced by some modern John Knox if they are ruining the lives of men by the charm and attraction of their pretty faces? When the great day of judgment comes it will be found that many of the sins of this day which we look upon as trivial will be catalogued as among the worst of sins in God's sight. And there is no sin, I believe, which will be more condemned than that sin so often practised by women with pretty faces, which is called the sin of flirtation—a sin which sometimes not only destroys all a man's true appreciation of a woman's honor, but will sometimes send a man into a drunkard's grave and into a suicide's eternity.

Shall the world honor the handsome face of Lord Byron, when one realizes to what base uses he put that handsome face? If you would read one of the vilest and the most disgusting revelations of depravity, all that you have to do is to turn the pages of Don Juan, which is believed to be an autobiography, and know what England's handsome poet was able to accomplish for the degradation of the human race. Oh, men and women, because sin is masked behind a beautiful countenance, remember it does not cease to be sin. God blasts the sin of a handsome Saul and he will blast the sins of our modern lecherous and adulterous Lotharios as well. Pity Samuel for clinging to the handsome Saul if you will, but do not condemn him, unless you condemn all the men and women who make excuses for the modern Don Juans because of their charm or their beauty.

Peril of Evil Association

I know it is hard to turn our backs upon some friends when we know they are doing wrong. I know that some of those friends wield a powerful influence over our lives. There is a breeziness, a freshness, an originality about some of them that holds us to them like a magnet. We know, furthermore, that some of those wicked friends love us with a devoted love. But if we do not break away from them in time, their sins will corrupt us. There is an old proverb which says: "If a man preaches what he does not believe, after a while he believes what he preaches." That is true; but another fact is also true. If you make a bosom friend out of one who is living contrary to all that you believe to be right, after a while you will begin to sin as he sins and do as he does. You cannot systematically associate with an evil-minded person and not in time become evil-minded yourself. And the more fascinating the friend, the quicker your own spiritual ruin.

What right have you to go with a man or a woman who will tell an immoral story? And I would warn my hearers of both sexes on this subject, for there are certain women who are just as shameless in listening to such stories as are some men. What right have you to go with men who are loose in their morals, or with those who make light of the purity of the home? What right have you to make bosom companions out of those who do not honor the house of God and all that the house of God stands for? What right have you to yoke yourself in business partnership with a man whom you have to watch every moment, for fear he will bring a scandal and a disgrace on the name of the firm? Did your Christian father and mother ever go with such associates as you select for

Your Daily Companions?

Would you be willing to have your companions make the coarse remarks before your wife or children which they often laughingly make before you? Either you must lift your daily companions up to your moral and spiritual level, or else they will drag you down to theirs, and there is no exception to the rule. Have you a right to associate with sinners and expect to escape becoming in time a companion with them in their sins?

But there was another reason why Samuel clung to the royal apostate. Saul was a king. He had been anointed by the order of the Lord God Almighty. He had been selected from all the tribes to rule over Israel. There was a certain sanctity about him. Of course, he had proved false to his trust; but still Saul was king. As king, the people had been taught to do him reverence. The hardest bands to break are the bands of regal authority. We are ready to send the common thief to the penitentiary; but we hate to impeach the honesty of those who have been placed over us in properly constituted authority. And yet, when the king does wrong, should he not suffer? When the President of the United States, or a legislator, or a governor, or a mayor does wrong, should he not also suffer? And when wickedness and corruption fasten themselves upon our political life, should we not, by the grace of God, cast off those sins and also cast off those politicians who are responsible for the moral obliquity?

A Conscientious Sheriff

I had this truth most wonderfully portrayed before me some time ago when I heard Samuel P. Pearson addressing a great popular meeting in Chicago. Mr. Pearson had been elected a few months before sheriff of Portland, Me. Although Maine was a "dry" State there were many "speak-easies" being run on the sly. The people of Maine's capital said those places could not be shut up, but Mr. Pearson said: "Elect me your sheriff, and in six weeks there will not be a speak-easy in all the county." The people took him at his word. He shut up those speak-easies so quickly that the saloon-keepers did not have time to ship their beer and whisky out of town, but had to empty the barrels in the gutter and let their poisonous liquors run away into the sewers, where they belonged. Well, of course Pearson's name was heralded from the Atlantic to the Pacific and praised by all good people. He was invited to address a ministers' mass meeting in Chicago, and there he told us how he became a Prohibitionist, and why he was so bitter against the other two political parties.

This was his story, as I remember it. When Pearson was a young man, there was an election going on in Portland. He stood in line waiting to cast his vote for a certain candidate. Ahead of him he saw a disreputable saloon-keeper. He accosted him and said: "Hello, So and So, for whom are you going to vote?" Strange to say, Mr. Pearson found out that this reputable saloon-keeper was going to vote for the same candidate he, Pearson, was supporting. Behind him he saw a notorious libertine, gambler and drunkard. Mr. Pearson asked him whom he was going to vote for, and strange to say, he found out that this libertine and drunkard wanted the same man elected as he, Pearson, was going to vote for. Then Mr. Pearson stopped and soliloquized: "Do I desire the same men to govern this city that those corrupt men want? Am I going to travel with the same crowd they run with? No, I am responsible to God and my country for the actions of the men whom I help to elect to office. You had better either purify your party and kick these dissolute members of society out, or else help start a new party, which these men will condemn. What they want, you don't. And what you should want, these men do not want." There is the whole question of political life in a nutshell.

Responsibility of Voters

Now, I care not how brilliant Saul may be when he is king; I care not to which political party he belongs; but this is what you should want to know: Whom is Saul serving? What kind of men wish him to be elected to the throne? Is this Saul who is seeking office to-day prepared to fight the saloon? Does this Saul promise to obliterate the gambling hells of the city? Does he promise to close up the dens of infamy? Does he want the Bible in the public schools? Is he the friend or the foe of the dissolute members of the community? With whom is he training? Do you elect Saul to a position of political life, and keep him there, merely because he is brilliant of tongue, and overlook the fact that he is rotten in morals? That is the question Samuel had to answer. And that is the reason God is hurling the rebuke of my text at the prophet of old, as well

INDIA MISSIONARIES IN CONFERENCE

Hindus and Mohammedans Unite in Welcoming the American Baptist Telugu Conference

THE Hindus and Mohammedans of Cumbum, India, united with the Christians in giving a royal welcome to sixty missionaries of the American Baptist Telugu Mission, who met there in conference December 27, 1907, to January 2, 1908. Along the road, for four long miles the road was spanned with gay arches, on which "Welcome, Welcome, Welcome!" was inscribed over and over again. On one of the arches was to be read: "Hail, Preachers of Truth!"

Praise God for this welcome! India has changed wonderfully. Not only in Cumbum, but throughout all India, the people, as a people, hail the missionaries as preachers of truth and as sons and daughters of mercy.

The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have done much to bring about this happy condition, for the people of Cumbum and of hundreds of other places have been fed with CHRISTIAN HERALD gifts during the late great famine, and they are beginning to realize that Christianity alone has the truth. Gratitude fills every heart, and love for the missionaries is to be seen on every face.

The personnel of this American Mission is nearly as cosmopolitan as that of America. We have German Mennonites from Russia, men who have never been in America, yet they have the true spirit of Americanism, which is the spirit of Jesus who sets all men free. There is Rev. A. Friesen, the senior, with his long beard. After eighteen years of service in India, on account of the ill health of Mrs. Friesen, he will return to Russia to work among the Russians on lines he has learned in India. Besides these noble pioneers, there are the stalwart brothers, C. and H. Unruh, the Rev. J.

Wiens, who preached the splendid Conference sermon in Telugu, and Rev. A. J. Hubert. During the past year two Swedes have joined the Mission, Rev. N. C. Parsons, who was for five years the pastor of the Swedish Baptist Church of Kansas City, and Rev. E. O. Schugren, of Minnesota. Canada has able representatives in Rev. G. H.

The children of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Home Circle will be interested in seeing among the missionary mothers and their children Miss A. M. Evans, who mothers them all. She came to us, after being in Y. W. C. A. work in Gloversville, N. Y., and working for three years as a teacher in Mont-Lawn, the CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home in Nyack, N. Y. All song. Few mortals have such glorious voices as Mr. and Mrs. Owen. We had congregational singing and singing by male mixed and female quartettes. But the keynote of all was Hebrews 3: 1: "Let us consider . . . Christ Jesus!" or, as the words are rendered in modern speech so true to the Greek: "Let us fix our thoughts on Jesus!" Jesus was our one and only theme, and every heart was filled and thrilled, for Brock and Rev. J. Hannah. Germany is represented by Rev. J. Dussmann and the writer; Holland, by the Huizinga brothers, and England, Scotland, Wales and other lands by the other missionaries whose ancestors came to America. Almost every Northern State has a representative here.

these missionaries sang the Coronation Hymn in one tongue.

While the Conference primarily met to transact the business of the Mission, yet much time was given to the business of spiritual growth. Singing was one of the great features of the Conference. Rev. W. C. Owen had charge of the service of

Jesus, the very thought of thee
With sweetness fills the breast;
But sweeter far thy face to see
And in thy presence rest!

Some of our best missionaries are Rev. and Mrs. J. Newcomb, who entertained the Conference. Mr. Newcomb is from Indiana, but after a short service in the U. S. Army, during the Civil War, he joined the British army in Canada, and eventually he came to India. While serving in the commissariat department in Secunderabad, he was converted, and for twenty-three years he has done a great work for Jesus in Cumbum. His commissariat training helped him in the entertainment of such an army of missionaries. The tents were pitched in military order, and the Mission compound was transformed into a camp where the hosts of Israel rested for seven days, in order to arrange new methods of warfare, and to lay new plans of conquest.

May God's richest blessing rest upon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers; upon all the pastors in America; upon the missionaries in all lands; yea, upon all the Church of Christ, and may God's Holy Spirit "fix our thoughts on Jesus" throughout the year!

as at some of us to-day. "How long wilt thou mourn for Saul? How long? How long?"

But there was still another reason why Samuel clung to this recreant king. Saul was Samuel's political protegee; Samuel was the instrument in God's hands chosen to make him king. Samuel lifted the anointing horn to pour the sacred oil upon Saul's head. And in one sense Samuel looked upon him as a loving parent sometimes looks upon the erring deeds of a favorite child. He tried to shield him and protect him and to ward off his coming doom. And when Samuel did this, he was like Eli. He only hastened the coming tragedy of this handsome king. Oh, it is an awful thing to see a father and mother shutting their eyes to the sins of a child! I almost tremble when I speak upon this. Yet I am firmly convinced that many young men and women have gone to destruction in the past, not because their parents have been too strict, but too lenient with the self-evident shortcomings of their children.

There is only one way to deal with the sins of children, and that is to eradicate them while they are young. And the more insignificant those sins seems to be, if let alone the more surely they will destroy the temporal and spiritual life of the child. Do you see that magnificent oak tree growing there on the hillside? Yes, it is a beauty. It has lifted itself like a mighty giant. No tornado is strong enough to blow that tree down. It has struck its roots clear down to the solid rock.

"But," you ask, "what are those strange-looking vines crawling up the sides of that tree?" Then you come nearer and say, "Why, they are the vines of the wild grapes. See how fine they are! I must take some home to the children." "Ah," I say, "is that so? Is that tree covered with the grape vines? Then, when you are eating the wild grapes you are eating the life-blood of the tree." If you will carefully examine the stems of the wild grapevine, you will find them filled with a lot of root-like suckers. These suckers fasten themselves into the tree, and draw the life out of the tree, and, give them time, like all vampire ivies, they will grow bigger and bigger. Then the suckers will sink deeper and deeper into the tree, until after a while that mighty tree will droop and die. Those few wild grapes may be very appetizing to your palate. They are very costly when they kill a tree to produce a few bunches of fruit.

Such are the bitter vampire sins of the child. It may not seem to be much when the child steals the candy after you have forbidden him to have it. It may not seem to be much when a child tells you a falsehood. It may not seem to be much when a child pretends to go to school when he is going skating. It may not seem to be much when a schoolboy commences to smoke cigarettes and drink beer. It may not seem to be much when the boy refuses to go to Sunday School or to church. These are little things in a little child's life. But though the wild grapes are appetizing, remember these little sins are the vampires sucking away the child's spiritual life. That fruit is made out of the life-blood of the child's spiritual existence. Beware, parent, how you, like Samuel, allow the sins of Saul to develop unrebuked.

But lastly, I think Samuel grieved for Saul because he said: "If Saul fails, who can make a success? Why, in all Israel there is not another like him. He is the handsomest and the best. What shall we do? What shall we do?" But God said: "Fear not, Samuel, I will raise up another. Take thy anointing horn and go where I tell thee. David will do for me what Saul has failed to do." So when we find a great man go astray, we say: "Oh, what shall we do? What shall we do?" But God will bring us another. Fear not; fear not. Only follow God and he will bring the right man to thee. If God anoints a man, then it is God's work and we have only to do his will.

And is it not a blessed thought that no one is essential to the Lord's work? God is always able to send some one to take the vacant place. Oh, how often we think we are necessary to the church or society! We say: "What will the home do without us?" Or, "What will the church do without us?" Or, "What will our business do without us?" Never fear, friend; when the time of our going is at hand, God will always have another to take our place. Therefore, does it not behoove us to do our work so well that when the time of our departure is at hand our successors will find the foundations well laid for building the superstructure? God can send another minister to follow us in the pulpit. He will send another teacher to follow us in the Sunday School. He will send another person to bless our loved ones in the home. May we to-day be like David, when he surrendered his throne to Solomon, rather than like sinful Saul, who had to be pushed aside by the divine hand to make room for David. Use us, O God! Use us, as thou didst thy sweet singer of Israel! Use us, Master, and use us now!

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST IRA E. HICKS recently closed a successful revival meeting at Minden, Neb.: 425 confessed Jesus as Saviour.

—EVANGELIST SMILEY lately conducted a series of very successful meetings at Mount Holly, N. J. Over 250 made public confession of Christ as Saviour.

—CHARLES EASTON, a Christian worker, is conducting a most deserving mission on Sullivan Street, Elmira, New York. He is greatly in need of lesson papers for his Sunday School.

—MISS SUSAN E. HASWELL, missionary at Alabama Plantation, Moulmein, Burma, writes that applications of orphan children—Chinese and Burmese—for admission to the Home she conducts at the mission station, are increasing rapidly. Funds are greatly needed to meet the new demands.

—MRS. SARAH W. PEOPLES, missionary at Nan, Burma, writes that an earnest effort is being made to evangelize a heathen inland tribe, the Yows, who are now receiving books and instruction. A school will be opened among them, and it is hoped that some of them may become evangelists and school teachers for their own people.

—DR. ALICE CONDUCT, of Ludhiana, India, writes: "The elegant electric plant which your readers' great generosity put in my hands is giving untold relief to the poor sufferers of India. I am made to rejoice at the unique results. The government inspector of the North India medical work bids me go on and prove to India all I can do, and he believes the government will in time adopt my methods."

—THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH at Whitehall, N. Y., under the leadership of Rev. A. D. Sheldon, assisted by Mr. B. Frank Butts as singer, has been visited by a gracious outpouring of the Spirit. Rev. J. Duffield, the pastor, writes: "For a long time our people prayed for a work which should be inspired by the Holy Spirit. One hundred persons, chiefly adults, signified their intention of consecrating their lives to the service of Christ."

WITH THE "GOOD-WILL FLEET"

OUR sailormen are receiving an ovation on their passage up the west coast of South America and seem to have taken a strong hold on the warm hearts of our South American neighbors.

Valparaiso, Chile, went wild with enthusiasm over the advent of the great white ships from the United States. Chile means the land of snow, but there was not the slightest chill in the atmosphere, or in the manners of the most dignified and conservative Chilean the afternoon the fleet arrived. A general holiday was proclaimed and special trains from Santiago and other cities and towns were run into Valparaiso. The trains were packed with sightseers who seemed enthusiastic over everything American, and made a most picturesque appearance in their gala clothes. Thousands took position on the hills about the city to watch the review, while others, in tugs, sailboats, rowboats and every kind of available craft, went out on the blue waters of the bay for a closer view of the battleships. The day was perfect with a gentle breeze, and the eye, unaided by the fieldglass, could see for miles.

The President of Chile, and all the members of his cabinet, and many people socially prominent in his capital, went on board the Pequeno Zenteno, to see the fleet pass in review.

Early in the afternoon the ships came and the people at once showed their appreciation of the fact that Admiral Evans had made a detour from his regular course in order to let them see the greatest fleet of battleships ever gathered for a single cruise. They came into the harbor with the flagship Connecticut leading, the rest following in single line. They made a half circle about the bay and the maneuvers lasted a full hour and a half, and were executed with faultless precision. The people on shore and in the boats cheered so heartily that they could be heard for a long distance, the shouts coming over the water to the American sailors in a continuous roar. The cannon of the forts and the Chilean warships boomed repeatedly in answer to the salutes of the battleships, which were all steaming by with the red and white banner of Chile hoisted to the fore. Through the crash of the guns could be heard now and then the blare of bugles and the rattle of drums, only to be lost a moment later in the general din.

The ships passed the presidential vessel, headed out to sea, and, veering to the right, were soon "hull down" on the horizon on their way to the north to Callao, in Peru, the land of the Incas.

The government of Peru began to plan for a cordial reception to Admiral Evans and his men as soon as the battleship fleet left Hampton Roads. The officials carefully watched the triumphant progress of the fleet and the elaborate receptions accorded it by the governments of the countries at whose ports the ships called. The officials evidently wished to surpass anything that had been done before and laid their plans accordingly.

The ships at Callao, the forts and the officers of the

An excursion was taken to Mount Meiggs by many of the Americans, special trains being provided at the expense of the South American hosts. The American Minister gave a reception to the officers as well as to the Peruvians who had been entertaining them. Admiral Evans, not to be outdone, opened several of his finest ships for the inspection of the people and entertained them most lavishly on board, and so the list of exchanges of good will went on until their enumeration would exhaust both space and the reader.

All of the Americans who are making the cruise already feel that the friendship between the United States and the South American countries has been so strongly cemented by the visits of the battleships that it cannot be broken by the ordinary jars that arise in the ordinary course of international relations. North Americans and South Americans understand each other better, and many pleasant personal friendships have been formed that will count in the future intercourse between the respective governments.

The destroyer fleet did not arrive as soon as the battleship fleet, its movements being regulated by a schedule independent of the one followed by the larger vessels; but the officers and men are really seeing more of the South American countries, as more frequent stops are being made.

Admiral Evans, it is rumored, will give up the command of the fleet when he reaches San Francisco, as he retires early in the fall from active service, and it is said that he will probably be succeeded by Captain Richard Wainwright, who has had a distinguished career in the navy. By July Captain Wainwright will be raised to the rank of rear admiral on account of the retirement of Rear Admiral Burwell. Wainwright would thus be in command during the cruise from San Francisco to the Philippine Islands if it should be decided to send the fleet there. If he takes command he will step over the heads of some senior admirals, but all of these are soon to retire, and it is understood that the government wants an admiral who can stay in command of the ships for at least two years. The others would find their time expiring at various points on the cruise, and would thus give the fleet a succession of commanders—something, it is understood, the Navy Department wishes to avoid.

View of Valparaiso, Chile, from the Harbor

army and navy received Admiral Evans with the honors due a vice-admiral, one grade higher than he actually holds. Three private firms arranged for receptions and entertainments for the Admiral and the members of his staff and his officers. The Admiral and his staff went to Lima, the capital, to call on President Jose Pardo, who received them with great cordiality, and the next day, in celebration of Washington's Birthday, the President gave a banquet to Evans and two hundred and fifty American officers and many prominent people of Peru in the great exhibition hall. The "men behind the guns" were not forgotten and the people of Callao did everything in their power to make their stay an enjoyable one.

TO CAPTURE THE WORLD FOR CHRIST

THE Presbyterian Men's Foreign Missionary Convention, held in Philadelphia February 11-13, was one of the most impressive gatherings of the kind that ever convened in that city. Some two thousand delegates and visitors were present, among them being missionaries from the far places of the earth, travelers who had investigated mission work in many lands, and men prominent in religious affairs throughout the country.

The convention hall was elaborately decorated, and here and there were display cards with missionary mottoes. Almost every speaker emphasized the fact that the time is ripe for aggressive action; that the nations are being aroused to the claims of Christianity, and are now receptive and plastic.

The delegates received a very cordial welcome on the opening day from the mayor of the city, who said, in part: "There are many denominations in our city, but there is one underlying faith, and that is that the family should be clean and pure; and so far as it is possible for one man to do it, I shall help to that end."

Dr. William H. Roberts, Moderator of the Northern Presbyterian Church, and Dr. J. W. Howerton, Moderator of the Southern Presbyterian Church, made stirring addresses, showing the vast strides that have been made in the work of foreign missions by these churches since 1834, when there were but three mission stations. To-day there are above 2,000. Then there were only two or three native converts; to-day there are above 3,000 native helpers in the Northern Church alone. There are 73,000 communicants, and 83,000 Sunday School scholars. The printing establishments distributed above 32,000,000 pages of religious literature in Chinese, Persian, Siamese, Laos and Arabic.

Rev. Homer C. Stuntz, representing the Methodist Church, spoke of the Methodist convention held in Cleveland in 1902, when the sum of $300,000 was collected for missions in less than an hour. Since that convention, which led to the organization of the Open Door and Young People's Missionary Committees, the Methodist Church has added to its contributions till they are now annually $2,000,000.

church that pays $2,100 annually for music, and yet can afford only $300 a year for foreign missions. Continuing, he said: "A man can afford $4,000 for a new touring car, but can give only $10 to missions; his wife may pay $20 for a plume for her hat, but gives only a half dollar for spreading the Gospel abroad."

Dr. J. H. Odell, a returned missionary, said: "One of our best schools in China we allowed to be closed recently merely because the missionary in charge was unable to get any replies to his persistent appeals for the $300 necessary to keep it going. There are men in this country who spend that sum for a wine dinner, and think nothing of it."

One of the ablest addresses was delivered on "The Interest of the Nations in the Foreign Missions of the Church," by J. A. Macdonald, editor of the Toronto Globe, Canada. On being introduced, he stated that an ancestor "was a Scotchman, who came to America in 1776, owing to circumstances over which he had no control, and that the people did not seem to appreciate him and would not let him stay." This raised quite a laugh. He made a strong plea for the brotherhood of nations. The convention closed with a masterful address by Robert E. Speer, who said, "The fundamental thing in the life of Christ was his noble sense of duty; and with him the idea of duty seems to have been ever related to the evangelization of the world. He was the Saviour of the whole world, and we are bound to carry him to the world. To recognize this duty and to set about discharging it is the vital test of faith and love." Other speakers were Mr. W. H. Grant, who has traveled widely in missionary lands; Dr. George Alexander, of the Presbyterian Board, and Mr. W. T. Ellis, who lately returned from a tour of missionary lands.

The resolutions declare in favor of raising $2,000,000 for foreign missions during the coming year; urge synods, presbyteries and individual churches to take steps to raise their full share; urge all church members to assist in gathering information concerning the progress of missions, for the purpose of inspiring the people, and propose that "the noon hour of each day be a time when all men may appeal to the throne of God for the speedy evangelization of the world."

RUSSIAN PILGRIMS IN HOLY LAND

By O. E. MOFFET

A Family Group

FROM Mount Tabor, the Plain of Esdraelon looks like a great carpet of irregular-sized squares. Dark green and light green; these are the wheat fields and meadows. The dark red is soil, newly plowed for the lentils. The road looks like a line stretched across this carpet.

Here I first saw the Russian pilgrims, fifteen hundred strong. They were creeping along that line like ants. The monks of the monastery on the mountain had already seen them, and were making preparations for their reception. Several iron kettles, each holding about a barrel, were set out on stones. Some brought nearly two miles long, came the rest of the company. We could see there were many women on foot and some had great burdens on their backs. All were walking slowly, with that odd, draggy step that tells of weariness.

We went into a great room of the monastery, where a monk gave us a lunch of bread, raisins, cheese and leben. While he served he told us how those straw mats would be spread down on the stone floor of the room and this would be the sleeping-place for three hundred. Each pilgrim carried his blanket, and his burden served as pillow. They only expected the mounted ones to climb to the monastery that evening. The rest would spend the night in Nazareth.

We hastened down from the mountain and took a position on the road leading up from the plains to see the pilgrims pass. What strong, powerful people they were! Most of the men had full beards and long hair. Only a few could afford to ride. These were singing a hymn as they approached Nazareth. We doffed our helmets, and all of the pilgrims uncovered as they passed. Some wore black fur caps, though the afternoon sun was very warm. Nearly all carried bundles and staffs. As the column approached, it seemed to be the color of dust; but as the individuals passed, one could see through this outer coating, the faded black and brown of the men's clothing and the brighter colors of the women's head-dresses and skirts. Most of the pilgrims were past middle life and many were old and infirm. These leaned heavily on their staffs as they came slowly and painfully up from the plains.

What struck me as most peculiar was the great variety of foot-wear. Many of the men wore great had made the journey from Jerusalem to Nazareth and back on foot. Now she was going down to Jordan to bathe at the Epiphany ceremony, and dip her burial shroud in the sacred waters. I saw her as she returned. Some kind-hearted countryman had loaned her a donkey for the long ascent from Jordan to Jerusalem.

The dragoman told me these people could hardly be induced to pay a penny for good water at the Samaritan's Inn, though they were suffering from thirst, but they contributed quite liberally to each monastery and church they visited. He said her story was the story of all. Each one had saved and sacrificed for years to thorns and brushwood to make fires around them, while others carried water from the well. A shepherd boy came from the mountain side driving several long-eared goats for slaughter. Pieces of straw matting were laid out on the grass to sun. These were the beds. With our glasses we could see the pilgrims quite distinctly, though they were ten or twelve miles away. First came a cavalcade, mounted on donkeys, two or three hundred in number. Following were the strongest walkers; while stretching back in an irregular line, leather boots reaching to the knees. Some had Russian shoes of strange patterns. The most common among the women was a clublike shoe, made entirely of straw. There were wood soles, leather soles, felt soles and straw soles. Some had worn out the shoes they brought, and had shod themselves with the red flat-soled shoe of the country. Many had no shoes at all, but rags bound on with strings.

They were a very devout people and never missed a shrine in all that long pilgrimage. I attended services at the Church of the Annunciation, when it was so crowded with the pilgrims that there was scarcely standing room. I could not help but feel the deep spiritual influence that swept over them, though not one word or feature of the service was familiar. The singing of these peasants was the sweetest I ever heard.

As I went down to Jericho I overtook an old woman traveling slowly with a staff in each hand. I was so touched by the sight of this old grandmother on that long dusty pilgrimage, that I asked a dragoman who came by to translate, for I wanted to talk to her. She said she had been successful in life and hers was a story of triumph. Like all the devout people of her country she commenced saving for this journey when very young. Sickness, deaths and revolutions had come time after time, and exhausted her small hoard. Now she was seventy-four years old, and the grandmother of fifty. It was more than fifty years since she commenced to put by, and at last she was triumphant. She make that pilgrimage, and each carried his shroud and would put it on and bathe in the sacred waters of Jordan, and then use it no more till his burial day. On Palm Sunday, fifteen thousand of these Russian pilgrims stood in procession at the door of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and their deep spiritual emotion shone in their faces. They stood there again on Easter, waiting for the "sacred fire" to come from the Holy Sepulchre. Then they departed to their homes.

Congress and the Motto

IT will be welcome news for those who have been earnestly urging the restoration of the time-honored motto, "In God We Trust," to the national coinage, to learn that all indications now point to an early victory. On February 19, the Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures of the House of Representatives, by an unanimous vote, reported favorably the bill introduced by Congressman W. B. McKinley of Illinois, for the restoration and permanent retention of the motto upon the coins. It is understood that the bill will meet with no opposition in the Senate. It will go into effect one month after its passage.

Christian people all over the land, who have united in the popular protest through this journal, will rejoice at a result, which will be accepted by the whole world as a convincing demonstration of the fact that this is a Christian nation. The motto will stand as a testimony that in all things that pertain to our national life, we still place our dependence upon Him who was the God of our forefathers, and who has made of us a great people and a power for good among the nations of the earth.

The "Gift of Healing"

MUCH interest has been awakened throughout the Christian Church, both here and abroad, by the recent remarkable developments in connection with what is known as the "gift of healing." A new impetus was given to the subject when, a few months ago, a well-known bishop announced his acceptance of the healing doctrine and his purpose of carrying it into practical use. Still more recently, a clergyman in Boston and another in Brooklyn decided to follow his example. They claim to be able to cure mental and nervous diseases through the medium of Christian faith alone, without the aid of hypnotism and simply by the laying on of hands, assuming faith on the part of the sufferer. While the pastor will not supersede the physician, it will be his duty to re-establish the spiritual health of the patient. That intimate relationship which exists between the physical and spiritual natures, stimulated by faith, is depended upon to accomplish the cure.

With many others, we shall follow the progress of this new development with interest, and in that spirit of tolerance which is now extended by the modern church to all who are striving, earnestly and unselfishly, to help their fellow-men. But though recent developments invest the subject with a certain novelty, it is as ancient as religion itself. All through the Old and New Testaments we find the unequivocal recognition of God as the helper and restorer of sick humanity (Exodus 15: 26), the pardoner of man's sins and the healer of his diseases (Psa. 103: 3). Christ's mission on earth was not only to the soul, but to the body, and the divine power is no-wise shortened to-day. God is still the source of health and blessing as in the ancient days, and if his children go to him in simple faith and make request in Christ's name, all physical as well as spiritual needs can be supplied (John 15: 16). They are to use the means at hand, and look to him for the blessing. Jesus himself never denounced doctors.

There is in many quarters a misapprehension concerning the belief of the orthodox Christian church to-day with regard to the "gift of healing." Nowhere is the Scriptural authority for the gift called in question. It is acknowledged that the presence of the Divine Spirit in the heart imparts wisdom, joy, peace and more abundant life, and opens the way to innumerable blessings.

A spiritual uplift affects the whole being and endows it with strength to resist sickness and danger. We have a right to ask our Father, in Christ's name, for health as well as for other blessings. Not a day passes in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD does not receive many letters showing the efficacy of prayer in the restoration of health as well as in other affairs of life. But these are the results of the personal prayers of faith from consecrated hearts and of holding fast to the promises. They have no relation whatever to any system now being promulgated outside of the orthodox church. They are, moreover, in line with the continuous development of that Christianity which was taught and practised by the great Physician, Jesus Christ. At the same time they are entirely distinct from the public ministry of healing, as illustrated in the cases of the Boston and Brooklyn pastors already referred to.

Was the miraculous "gift of healing," as a public religious function, a special endowment of apostolic days, which after a time ceased to be permanent or even necessary, or is it a continuous inheritance, capable of practical realization by the religious teachers of the present day? This is the question now before the religious world. People have watched similar experiments before, and have seen them wax and flourish and wane.

Our churches, for the most part, hesitate to approve a course which may open the door to religious hysteria; yet if God should choose to place the gift of healing in the hands of his servants, the churches would not withhold recognition. If it should prove, however, that the work was merely of human seeking and not of divine ordination, though tens of thousands might be attracted by it, it could result only in distraction and confusion. Hence, it is the duty of all good Christians to treat every movement of this character with patience and toleration. If it be the Lord's work, he will establish it before men; if otherwise, it will pass away like other ephemera, leaving hardly a trace behind.

A Question of Citizenship

F. W. B. Raymond, Minn. Is Hill's Manual correct in stating that the native-born son of a foreign subject residing in the United States must be naturalized in order to become a citizen?

COUNSELOR G. H. CRAWFORD, to whom this question has been referred, gives the following explicit interpretation of the law. His explanation is of general interest to all readers: In U. S. v. Wong Kim Ark, 169, U. S., at page 674, the U. S. Supreme Court (Mr. Justice Gray) laid down the law as follows:

Passing by questions once earnestly controverted, but finally put at rest by the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution, it is beyond doubt that, before the enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1866, or the adoption of the Constitutional Amendment, all white persons at least, born within the sovereignty of the United States, whether children of citizens or of foreigners, excepting only children of ambassadors or public ministers of a foreign government, were native-born citizens of the United States.

This statement of the law appears in the opinion of the Court, after an exhaustive review of the authorities, and establishes the rule that all white persons, except children of ambassadors or public ministers of a foreign government; as ex. gr., children born here of German, French, Italian, Spanish, Austrian or Russian parents, etc., and not within the exception stated, are citizens of the United States, whether the parents are naturalized or not. In the case from which the above quotation is taken the question was whether the child of Chinese parents, born in this country, is a citizen, the law of the United States being that Chinese persons may not be naturalized; or in other words whether a child born in the United States of aliens whose naturalization is forbidden by law, was, by the fact of birth here, a citizen of the United States. After a long discussion, the Court held that by virtue of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States, Wong Kim Ark, who was born in the United States of Chinese parents, who were subjects of the Emperor of China and were at the time of the birth of their child domiciled residents of the United States, where they had established a permanent domicile and residence, was a citizen of the United States, notwithstanding the alienage of his parents, and notwithstanding that the law prevented his parents themselves from becoming naturalized. The statute bearing upon the question is Sec. 1992 of the United States Compiled Statutes, vol. I., p. 1268, ed. 1901. It reads:

All persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are declared to be citizens of the United States.

The Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, finally adopted in the year 1868, says:

SEC. 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside, etc.

Previous to the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment Congress had passed the "Civil Rights Act," in 1866, which contained a declaration of law exactly the same as the sentence which is quoted from the Fourteenth Amendment.

The right of naturalization is not so broad as the right of native-born citizenship. The Courts of the United States have held that the right of naturalization did not extend to the Chinese or Japanese, the interpretation of the naturalization laws being that Congress may exclude persons belonging to the Mongolian race. Numerous cases have been decided by the Courts of the United States, to which it is unnecessary to refer. There is no doubt that a "native born son of a foreign subject, residing in the United States," becomes a citizen by the mere fact of his birth here, unless he is a child of an ambassador or public minister of a foreign government.

Saved from Suicide

HIGHLY suggestive is the report General Booth has published of the results of the effort to prevent suicide which has been made in England by the Salvation Army. The bureau has been a year in existence, and the need of such an organization and the value of its services can now be estimated. The bureau received instructions at the beginning of its work to proceed under three rules: Free consultation and advice; inviolable secrecy; no guarantee of financial aid. Every person meditating suicide was invited to apply to the bureau and state the circumstances which were impelling him or her to self-destruction, and the promise of sympathy and consideration was made. The idea was that in many cases the intending suicide was friendless, or had no friends to whom he could go for advice, and that a cheerful and friendly view of the situation might inspire hope, or at least patience.

The figures justify the experiment. During the year 1,125 men and ninety women applied to the bureau, and General Booth feels safe in saying that at least three-fourths of the number were deterred through the efforts of the bureau from committing the fatal act. The officers were surprised to find how large a number of the applicants revived under the sympathy, prayer and encouragement at their first call, and left in a more cheerful frame of mind, wondering how they could have become so depressed as to meditate suicide. The very contact with faithful, hopeful, prayerful men worked a healthy change in their spirit and led them to trust in the Almighty Friend to whom they were encouraged to commit their difficulties.

More than one-half of the applicants were overwhelmed with financial troubles. These did not come from the very poor. Indeed, the poorest people were conspicuously absent from the bureau. General Booth thinks that probably these people were so accustomed to poverty, or were in so bloodless a condition, that suicide was not attractive to them. They were chiefly people who had lost money, or a situation, or were under some sudden pressure. Efforts were made to find such persons employment, and in some cases temporary loans were made, in spite of the rule, to tide them over an emergency.

Other causes of trouble were drink, drugs and disease. About one-tenth of the whole number of applicants were driven to contemplate suicide from these causes, and here, too, wise remedial measures were applied with success. It was melancholia induced by loneliness, by brooding over troubles, that occasioned the most difficulty. These victims were chiefly women, and it was hard work getting such persons to take a more cheerful view of life, but even with these the warm friendliness and the earnest faith which is contagious did much. The lesson that the ordinary Christian may learn from the report is, that outside such an organization he may do more good than he knows by a cheerful word and a friendly greeting to those with whom he comes in contact.

Famous Egyptian Tombs

HIGH in the mountains of Egypt, and hewn out of solid rock, are the tombs of Beni Hasan, recently discovered. The inscriptions show that the interments in them were made from four to five thousand years ago. The discovery has drawn a large crowd of interested scholars, visitors and officials. The inscriptions have not yet been deciphered, but it is believed from various indications that they are the resting place of great Egyptian governors who flourished under Usertsen I. and his immediate successor. One sarcophagus bears the name of Amenemhat, but it is not known whether it belonged to any of the kings of that name. The tombs are thirty-nine in number and are three hours' journey from the banks of the Nile.

The most remarkable characteristic of the tombs is the number of models, singly or in groups, that they contain. A French writer who has made an exhaustive study of Egyptian history, writing in an antiquarian journal says: "The question is often asked why it is that Egyptian tombs contain so many such figures. The answer is interesting. There was no race of people who kept death so constantly before them as the Egyptians. It was before them all through their lives. The pious Egyptian built his tomb during his lifetime, he superintended its construction, or its cutting out of the rock, with all or even more attention than he paid to the erection of his earthly dwelling. He painted its walls with the happiest scenes in his life, or the most important events in his official career. His coffin was certainly, in the case of rich men, made before his death, and scribes often wrote themselves the copy of the Book of the Dead, which was to act as their guidebook in the next world. The tomb was furnished with models of various kinds—figures of servants, groups of men in various domestic occupations, brewing beer, baking bread, storing corn in the granaries, or slaying oxen for the feast. Models of ships and boats were placed in the tombs.

No doubt in ancient times the custom was to slay at the tomb of the deceased noble, certain servants who would go with their master in the spirit to the next world, and there relieve him of menial duties. Later the more humane custom was to make small figures of these workmen, the more according to the deceased's rank, and place them in the tomb, so that these doubles might perform the work. These little figures are inscribed with the Sixth Chapter of the Book of the Dead. Here we find that their name was Ushabtii, or Answerers, a name of which the origin is given. In the chapter the master tells them to watch the work, and when he is called, to answer: "Behold! I am he whom ye call." Thus provision was made for his living such a life beyond the grave as he had lived here and maintaining his rank and status. The poor fellaheen who toiled for him here they supposed would toil for him there. They did not rise to the conception of compensation that Christ enunciated in his parable of the rich man and Lazarus:

Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things and likewise Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted and thou art tormented. (Luke 16: 25.)

A Missionary's Warning

An earnest warning to those in various parts of the country who claim to have the "gift of tongues" is given by Rev. F. C. Todd, a missionary at Macao, China. He says that a number of persons have gone to China, Japan and India, believing that they had the gift of tongues and could preach to the people without learning the language. One party of several preachers from the State of Washington went to Japan fully expecting that the Japanese would understand them. Mr. Todd went to see them and found them utterly unable to make themselves understood. In another instance a preacher and his wife went to India with the same expectation. Mr. Todd saw them, too, and found that they needed an interpreter, as other newly arrived missionaries do. Similarly many have gone to China, who confessed to him that they had been disappointed and that neither in preaching nor in the ordinary affairs of life had they found anyone who could understand the tongues. These facts, he says, should be widely published as a warning to sincere but mistaken people. Whatever the use of the new gift may be, it is not of the same utility as the business acquaintance. He did not recognize him under the name of Martin, and the brother having so long used the name of Martin forgot at the moment that his real name was the same as that of the man to whom he was talking. The opportunity of fraternization passed and now the brother who is known as Martin has disappeared and the other is vainly endeavoring to trace him. It is matter for regret when men of different denominations meet without recognizing one another as brothers, and this sometimes happens through the stress laid on denominational affiliations, instead of on brotherhood in Christ.

Every one of you saith, I am of Paul; and I of Apollos; and I of Cephas; . . . is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for you? (I. Cor. 1: 12, 13.)

gift at Pentecost, when those who had the gift could preach intelligibly to men of various lands.

Every man heard them speak in his own language. (Acts 2: 6.)

An Unrecognized Brother

A citizen of New York is making a search for a brother from whom he was separated in 1875. He lost both his parents in that year, and he and his brother were placed in different charitable institutions. As soon as he was old enough to work, he obtained employment and supported himself. He made inquiries for his brother, and learned that he had been placed with a farmer in Connecticut. No further tidings have come in the years that have passed; but recently he met a man who knew the farmer and remembered the boy. He said the farmer was named Martin, and the boy had taken that name. He subsequently ascertained where he had worked, and, to his astonishment, found that three years ago he had actually been introduced to his brother by a

Blank Checks Stolen

A man has been arrested at Somerville, N. J., who is charged with stealing a number of blank checks. For some time past these checks have been disappearing from country railroad stations and the police have been unable to trace the thief. No great effort was made to find him, as none of them had been presented with forged signatures, and the loss of the checks was small. Some other charge led to the arrest of this man and in his possession the missing checks were found. He was a very ignorant man, unused to the ways of cities, and had fallen into a mistake through being unable to read. On being questioned, he confessed his crime and explained why he had stolen the worthless plunder. He had once been paid for some work he did on the roads with a check, and the exchange of a piece of paper for money at the bank led him to believe that everything in the shape of a bank check was as good as gold. He would have learned his mistake very quickly had he offered one at the bank. It would have been explained to him that the value of a check is determined by the resources of the man whose signature it bears. It would be well if that fact were realized by people who fear to trust the promises of God though he confirms them, as we are told in his Word, by an oath.

God, willing more abundantly to shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath. (Heb. 6: 17.)

Merchant a Thief

A remarkable confession has been made by a prosperous merchant in Brooklyn, N. Y., who was recently arrested for picking pockets. When he was arrested his friends and men with whom he had done business, made indignant protests and promptly gave bail for him. The prisoner astonished his acquaintances by making a full confession. He said he was born thirty-three years ago in New York. At the age of fifteen he fell in with a band of stylishly dressed young men who proved to be pickpockets. Their trainer was an old man who also helped them to dispose of their plunder. The youth soon became an adept, and went to Chicago, where he continued his course without having to divide with the gang. Thence he went to St. Louis, where he was caught trying to pick the pockets of a detective. He was convicted and received a severe sentence. While in the St. Louis prison he determined to lead a new life. On being released he returned to New York, and for more than a year attended strictly to his business. But one day an opportunity to pick a pocket occurred while he was on a car, and he yielded to the temptation. From that time the old habits asserted their sway, and though he continued his business in the day, he was a criminal at night. He declared that he had striven hard to live a clean life, but the temptation to steal was irresistible. It may have been so in his own strength, but if he had sought the divine help offered to him he would have conquered.

He is able to succor them that are tempted. (Heb. 2: 18.)

TRAINS RUN BENEATH THE HUDSON

New York and New Jersey Are Now Joined by Four Submarine Steel Tubes

AFTER years of planning by the most famous and experienced engineers and work by thousands of skilled mechanics, assisted by an army of laborers, the great system of Hudson River tunnels has been practically completed and the first train sent speeding between New York and New Jersey at a rate that threatens to destroy forever the usefulness of the ferryboats that make the passage overhead.

According to the programme, President Roosevelt was to touch a button and start two trains of eight cars each toward the centre of the tunnel. In the train from the west would be Governor Fort of New Jersey, and in the one from the east Governor Hughes of New York. Accompanied by their staffs, the governors would greet one another and exchange mutual congratulations over to go ahead. If there is the slightest obstruction, such as a part of a woman's dress caught in the door, the signal will not work.

There are four tubes in the system and the tunnel just opened connects Sixth Avenue and Nineteenth Street, New York City, with the Lackawanna Railroad Station in Hoboken. The remaining tubes will be opened in the spring, benefiting over a million and a half of people. Hundreds of city dwellers, who have looked with longing eyes at the green hills of northern New Jersey, will probably move over from New York now that the journey has been shortened, and the most uncomfortable part of it—the ferry ride—entirely done away with. To the people already living in the towns of New Jersey near the Hudson, it means that they may avail themselves of all the advantages of New York City as easily as if their homes were in the residential districts of the Bronx, or the northern part of the Island of Manhattan. The length of all parts of the system is eighteen miles.

There are two tubes in the section of the system where the cars have been put in—one for outgoing, the other for incoming trains. These tubes are of steel, made of rings of steel, bolted together and put in place as fast as the great shield forced a way for them through the mud and gravel of the river. The tubes, for much of the distance, are about thirty feet distant from each other. They lie about sixty feet below the bottom of the river, and ninety feet below the surface of the water where hundreds of vessels, large and small, plow their way every day, crews and passengers alike, hardly conscious of the fact that they are sailing over a part of a railroad line, where people are riding in luxurious cars, and reading perhaps that a certain steamer is expected to arrive, which at that very moment may be churning the waters overhead.

The tubes make a circle of fifteen feet in diameter, and are coated with concrete. They are about three miles in length, and when everything has been thoroughly tested and is in working order, it is expected that trains will make the trip from New York to New Jersey in ten minutes. The line will soon be extended to a point near the new Terminal Station of the Pennsylvania Railroad at Thirty-third Street. There will be several subway stations on this part of the line.

There is another set of tubes nearly completed which extend under the Hudson River from Fulton Street and Cortlandt Street, New York City, to Jersey City. The station in the latter place has been blasted out of the solid rock many feet beneath the train shed of the Pennsylvania Railroad, where the trains start for Philadelphia, Washington and the South. The terminal of the Jersey City tubes and the terminal of the Hoboken tubes will be joined by a tunnel which has been dug along the New Jersey shore of the Hudson River for about a mile and a quarter. Stations will give access to the Pennsylvania, Erie and Lackawanna Railroad systems. Thus passengers from almost any point in New York can get to their trains in the most inclement weather without going to the surface. Joining this tunnel another one goes under the crowded parts of Jersey City, and then opens out on the tracks of the Pennsylvania Railroad, from which point the trains speed quickly on to Newark and other suburban cities and towns.

In New York City itself, other connections are already being made with the present system of lines stretching north and south from Harlem to the Battery. One will go from the Sixth Avenue line already mentioned, across town to Astor Place, where it will meet the Interborough lines. If a few more are constructed, only underground office buildings and hotels will be lacking to enable the New Yorker to spend all of his time beneath the earth's surface. In fact, at the present time, several hotels and stores have entrances on the subways. In the near future a woman visitor to the city may go from her room in the hotel to an elevator, descend several stories, take a subway train to some store that has a subway entrance, complete her shopping, take another train to Hoboken, and there take a train for Philadelphia. When she leaves the station in Philadelphia she will be in the open air for the first time since she entered her hotel in New York. How this would astonish Benjamin Franklin if he could come back to earth for a moment. It will be remembered that he was quite a traveler, and that it took him three days once to get from Philadelphia to New York, riding on the top of a stage coach, the driver knitting stockings most of the way. And though the great engineering feat that had come to a successful conclusion.

The first public trip of inspection, however, was made by a party of one hundred officials, engineers and newspaper men a week before the formal ceremony of opening. They found that the cars, and the system of starting and stopping the trains, had many features to add to the safety and comfort of the passengers. The cars are made of steel with doors both at the sides and ends. The passengers enter on one side and leave on the other, thus doing away with the congestion that comes from one stream of people trying to get off while others endeavor to force their way in. The seats are placed along the sides and at intervals rise metal posts to which passengers who have not got seats may hold. There are two ways of ventilation: one comes from the air drawn in by the moving train, the other by artificial openings and tubes. The cars come along the station platform in a straight line leaving no wide spaces in which a passenger can fall or catch his foot. The doors open and shut automatically. When the last door is closed an electric light signals the motorman

Franklin predicted many wonderful things in a scientific way, he probably never conceived, even in his wildest flights of fancy, anything half so wonderful as has been accomplished in settling the great rapid transit problems about New York.

A LENTEN HOME TALK

By Margaret E. Sangster

If Christ Were Here

IN studying the life of Christ as it was written by four evangelists, four men who saw and knew him, and who were not removed from his bodily presence, as we are, by nearly two thousand years, we are at first impressed by his majestic claim to be the Son of God. Jesus Christ was God in human flesh. He came to be the life and the light of men; the living bread, the living water were his to give. We are on the threshold of the season that is more and more observed by Christian people as a period of pause amid social pleasures and worldly activities when they may draw near to Jesus Christ and get in touch with him. It is a pertinent question at the beginning of Lent for each of us, What would we do if Christ were here? In very truth he is here, filling our hearts and homes with strength and sweetness; but the question we would ask is one that carries us back to the days when he walked in Galilee and Jerusalem. A few women ministered to him then, a few men followed him everywhere, a handful of people were his disciples and friends. Vast multitudes knew about his wonderful works, and crowds thronged the streets and roads, that they might see his miracles. Yet, when the time came for his arrest, trial and crucifixion, it is written that all men forsook him and fled. Were Christ here to-day, as he was in old Judea, would we belong to the few or the many?

Let us imagine that Christ should appear in twentieth century garb, in New York, in this month of March. New York is a city of tremendous contrasts. The luxury of old Rome, in its imperial splendor, pales before the luxury of the New York millionaire. No past magnificence or wealth of the world can bear comparison with that of the city that stands at the gateway of the West, holding out her hands in welcome to the rest of the globe. At the same time, no poverty or squalor, no distress and suffering of other days can, by any possibility, exceed that which is endured as a matter of course by thousands upon thousands in this same great city. Riches and poverty jostle each other on the pavement. Those who serve in the homes of ample space and easy comfort, often have kindred whose means are of the narrowest, and who drain to the depth the cup of continual anxiety. If Christ were here and we had clear vision to see him, would we be so contented as we are to do our alms-giving by proxy, to refuse to help a struggling brother unless we could do so through organized charity? Would we consent, were we Christ-like and Christ were here, to let children go hungry and old people perish with cold and exhaustion, while we did nothing to help them?

This question is not socialism. It is simply a question of what we would do if we took a walk with our Lord anywhere on the East Side or the West, where the population is thick and the people are strangers and ignorant and poor.

If Christ were here and he came into our households, do you think that we would yield to the temptation to be fretful, unreasonable, arrogant and disagreeable? Would we let petty jealousies and envies steal into the household? Would there be in our lives any secrets that could not bear the light, if we understood that Christ was here and was looking straight into our hearts? Would we under any stress of provocation, however great, either hastily or deliberately, say a word that could pierce another soul like a barbed arrow with its poison of contempt, or its undertone of scorn? Would we ever be uncivil or discourteous or less than gentle, considerate and kind, if we had the feeling that here in the room with us was the divine Master, and that he heard our words and saw our manner? Would we withhold advice, sympathy, assistance, encouragement to a friend or brother who was bearing life's burdens and finding the road very difficult, if Christ were here at our side, and shamed us by his surprise at our attitude of aloofness? Would we not all prefer to be good Samaritans rather than haughty priests and indifferent Levites if Christ were here and it were our privilege to walk and talk with him?

When Christ was in the world, he opened blind eyes and deaf ears, cooled fevered brows, enabled the lame to walk and restored the dead to life. There are still blind eyes to open and deaf ears to be unstopped; there are the sick to be cheered and the mourners to comfort, and by Christ's help we may aid the dead in sin to awaken to a new life. This is our mission. Alas, day by day we need to pray in our individual experience, "from blindness of mind and hardness of heart, good Lord, deliver us."

Looking back over the last twelvemonth, which of us has not much to regret? Which of us would not, were it possible, undo some mistakes, retract some utterances, call back some memories that carried pain with them when it was in our power to have been messengers of gladness? The lesson of Lent is a lesson of getting nearer, if we can, to the dear Lord in com-

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY

To man and maid in life's sweet spring,
There comes a trysting day,
When soft and clear the joybells ring
Beneath the words they say.

She listens as he pleads with her
His queen of love to stay;
She smiles upon her worshiper;
So runs the world away.

plete imitation of him. In all candor, let us ask ourselves what would we be, what would we do, how would we live, if Christ were here?

I WOULDN'T BE CROSS

I wouldn't be cross, dear, it's never worth while;
Disarm the vexation by wearing a smile;
Let hap a disaster, a trouble, a loss,
Just meet the thing boldly, and never be cross.

I wouldn't be cross, dear, with people at home;
They love you so fondly, whatever may come,
You may count on the kinsfolk around you to stand,
Oh, loyally true in a brotherly band.
So, since the fine gold far exceedeth the dross,
I wouldn't be cross, dear, I wouldn't be cross.

I wouldn't be cross with a stranger, ah, no;
To the pilgrims we meet on the life path we owe
This kindness to give them good cheer as they pass,
To clear out the flint-stones and plant the soft grass.
No, dear, with a stranger, in trial or loss,
I perchance might be silent—I wouldn't be cross.

No bitterness sweetens, no sharpness may heal
The wound which the soul is too proud to reveal.
No envy hath peace; by a fret and a jar
The beautiful work of our hands we may mar.
Let happen what may, dear, of trouble and loss,
I wouldn't be cross, love, I wouldn't be cross.

Wanted, a Friend

THERE'S a bit of Christian work waiting for somebody to do, and very possibly the somebody is yourself. It is the sort of work that makes no show, never sounds a trumpet before it, and will not set your name high on the scroll of fame. The only eyes that will take much notice of the work or of you are the eyes of the watching angels who always behold the face of the Master. Down in the next street there is a poor fellow who has lost his grip, has found temptation too strong for him, and is taking a sort of toboggan slide toward ruin. Before the inevitable downfall comes, he needs help, he needs a friend. You may be the one called upon to be that man's friend.

When, a few years ago, Hugh Beaver, in his twenty-fourth year, after a few days' illness, left this world for a higher service, men came from far and near to attend his funeral. At the door of the church where crowds were entering, a poor man stood, shabby, disreputable, slouching, discouraged. Probably the ushers had no thought of keeping him away, but it seemed to him that they had, and he said to one of them, in hushed but determined tones, "I am going to attend Hugh Beaver's funeral. I am pretty low-down, but there's never been the day when Hugh Beaver was ashamed to put his arm through mine and walk up the street with me."

On the same day a stranger, alighting at the station in the Pennsylvania town where this young soldier of Christ had fallen asleep, inquired the way to the Presbyterian Church. The person of whom he asked drove a hack. "You have come to attend Hugh Beaver's funeral," he said. "I knew him. He brought me to Christ."

What the world wants is friends. What the church wants is friends. What hearts want is a key. When our Lord began his earthly ministry he gathered about him a little company of friends. One friend spoke to another; one friend brought in another; we are too unfriendly in our church life. We are too ready to confuse the sin and the sinner. We may hate and abhor sin as much as we please, but for individual sinners we should have not mere tolerance, but a spirit of tender sympathy and of loving comradeship.

There are lonely hearts to cherish
While the days are going by.

How do you know where those hearts beat? The maid in your kitchen may carry one, the lad who runs the elevator in the hotel may have another, the young woman behind the counter with an ailing father or mother at home, the doctor going about among his patients, the nurse at the bedside, the child in the school-room, may have a lonely heart. Lonely hearts need friends. The world wanted a friend once, and God saw it and sent his own Son, not to condemn, but to save the world. The very sweetest thing our Master ever said to his disciples was the thing he is saying now, "I have not called you servants; I have called you friends."

Look about you and see if you cannot find an opportunity for gentle, unobtrusive and genuine friendship. Look about you and discover where you can do good by the touch of human kindness. The full purse may overflow in bounty, but so may the full heart, and the one may do as much good as the other.

CLEAR VISION OF SOUL

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

AS Jesus was entering the gate of the temple "he saw a man who was blind from his birth." Beggars at the doors of churches are familiar sights in Europe to-day; all travelers will bear witness to this. In Rome there is hardly a church which has not its gathering of beggars around the entrance door. As to this particular beggar Edersheim says: "On the Sabbath he would of course neither ask nor receive alms, though his presence in the wonted place would secure wider notice, and perhaps lead to many private gifts. The blind were regarded as specially entitled to charity."

A Persistent Question

This question, asked by the disciples, "Who did sin, this man or his parents?" was often upon the lips of the Jews, possibly because it was ground into their consciousness that the iniquity of the fathers should be visited upon the children of those who hated God. There was, in this instance, some idea that the man might be suffering blindness because of his own sins. Jesus said of this particular man, "Neither hath he sinned, nor his parents, but that the works of God should be made manifest in him." This was the secret of the man's blindness. "The man himself was intended to be a symbol." In heathen lands blind people are helpless dependents, mostly living by the wayside begging. But in Christian lands how different! No blind person needs to beg, because of the asylums where sick and feeble blind folk are cared for, and because of the schools where they are taught many trades. The encyclopedia gives a long list of blind people who have become eminent as musicians, sculptors, philosophers, preachers, authors, astronomers, mathematicians and mechanics, and so the works of God are made manifest in diverse ways.

Jesus said, "I must work the works of him that sent me." On another occasion: "He hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised" (Luke 4: 18). "The night cometh, when no man can work"—the night of death. "And yet," as Henry Ward Beecher said, "how little do we measure the progress of things! How little do we look forward and say: 'If I have anything to do I must do it quickly; for the night is coming!' If you have anything to do in behalf of the poor, you have but little time to do it in. If you have anything to do in behalf of your own class, there's but little time for you to do it in. If you have anything to do in Christian literature, or in the establishment of institutions of religion; if you have anything to do in making the world wiser, and better, and purer, and happier, you have no time to lose. The night comes when no man can work."

Presuming on Time

"Probably not one in a hundred of all that are before me, however active he may be, is using the whole economy of his nature according to the power that is in it. The resources of your being are altogether disproportioned to the products which you bring forth. You are living with various energy in secular things; but when you consider yourselves as complex creatures, as living toward God, as living toward the whole commonwealth, as living in your family relations toward those who are dependent upon you, and as living toward yourselves, you cannot wisely look at what you are and not feel that you are living delinquently, that you are presuming upon time, and that you are not habitually measuring matters by a sober consideration of death."

"I am the light of the world." The power of Jesus to open blind eyes in the world to-day is upon the physicians who work in his name. And so medical missionaries are in the direct line of succession to Christ the Great Physician. In Peking there is an asylum and school for the blind which has been carried on for over forty years by a devoted Christian Scotch missionary. In all missionary lands there is healing for the blind. In Canton, China, there is a refuge for the insane under American missionaries—the only one in China, and in which many who come there are returned to their homes cured.

"He spat on the ground, and anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay." The standard treatment for blind eyes in those days was spittle-moistened clay. Jesus made use of that custom in order that he might be better understood by the people. But the result was to be far different from what they had been accustomed to seeing—rarely if ever had they seen blind eyes restored to sight by such a process. Because Jesus did it that day the power of God was made manifest. "Go, wash in the Pool of Siloam." It is always God's plan to make a man take some part in his own cure. There are many who need to be reminded that Jesus does not deliver a simply passive supplicant. He must show his faith and obedience. To such as do that the divine hand is held out in help.

Obedience Precedes Cure

"He went his way, and washed, and came, seeing." The blind man went to the Pool of Siloam, and in obedience found healing. A sceptic would have said: "What is the use of going?" or, "You have healed others by a touch or a word, why not me?" If the blind man had any doubts they were dispelled by the doing, for he came back seeing. As Dr. Talmage used to say: "I know why he could open blind eyes: it was he who made the optic nerve."

"Is not this he that sat and begged?" "This is he." "He is like him." So said those who gazed upon him, struck by the strange appearance which sight gave to the beggar. They could hardly believe their own eyes. Some people are of such suspicious nature that they are always looking out to find imposition. But the man said, "I am he," and in response to their question, "How were thine eyes opened?" he told them how in the fewest possible words. "He made clay, anointed my eyes—said, 'Go, wash.' I went, washed, received sight"—the whole story in a nutshell. "Where is he?" "I know not." In a deeper sense than appears in his answer, he knew not Jesus. For the first time he looked upon Jesus a few hours after his healing as he met him in the temple. There Jesus revealed himself to him, not only as his healer, but as his Saviour, and the beggar cried out, "Lord, I believe," and he worshiped him.

It mattered not that the carping Pharisees stood by, they who, since his healing, had made every effort to discredit him who had healed him, and had even tried to make it seem that the man had not been blind.

Jesus Gives Sight

The central truth of this lesson is the power of Jesus to help the blind: in body—in soul. The living Saviour has given sight to a living man. He gives bodily sight, as in this case, and in every case, for what are the laws of nature but the fixed operations of his will? He gives mental sight, enabling Bacon and Newton and others to see great facts of nature that were not seen before. He gives moral sight, enabling Confucius and Zoroaster and Socrates to see great facts of the human soul. But, above all—and with that we are mainly concerned—he gives spiritual sight, enabling us to see ourselves as sinners, and God as our loving Father, pardoning iniquity, transgression and sin.

Sunday School Lesson—Continued

"Lord, I pray thee, open his eyes, that he may see." Such was the prayer of Elisha for his servant (II. Kings 6:17), terrified by the sight of the pursuing Syrian army surrounding Dothan, where Elisha and his servant had halted for the night. Elisha had no fear, and he had tried to put courage into his servant by saying, "They that be with us are more than they that be with them." God did cause the servant to see the host of heaven ready to defend them, for behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots round about Elisha. This man already had his sight and could see all that other men could, but he had not the sight of Elisha until God gave it to him or a moment, to give him faith and courage.

What Is It Like in Common Life?

To the Amritsar Hospital, in India, came a blind Hindu woman eighty years of age, who asked the doctor at the door, "Are you he who gives people new eyes?" No, but I sometimes mend old ones." On examination it was found her case required such an operation as one of her great age could hardly be expected to go through successfully. She cried, "I will tell all I have and give it to you, and I will bear any pain or privation if you will give me sight for even five minutes." She explained that she had had but one son, and when he had died, she had wept her eyes away, but that since his death a grandchild had been born whom she had never seen, and she said: "I will give all I have to see his face for a moment before I die."

The earnest missionary doctor told her of God the Father of Jesus, and of heaven, and so opened the eyes of her blinded soul. When they parted, she said: "You can talk of going to heaven by and by. If you only knew it, in what I have heard and felt, I have heaven now!" Jesus had proved to her the light of life. It is the testimony of medical missionaries that the healing of the body is the most direct way of reaching the souls that sit in darkness.

An incident from daily life to help a young man: "A young man, who was a decided and thorough unbeliever—so decided that the arguments of modern infidels seemed to him very inferior—at the age of twenty-five years chanced to fall in with a copy of Strauss' Life of Jesus. He eagerly devoured the book. He was charmed with the keenness of its statements and the completeness of its views. But the more he read, the more he was impressed by the conviction that if the display of such keenness and ability was necessary to prove the Gospel history a myth, it is a far simpler thing to accept the history just as it stands. Thus the scales fell from his eyes. His former system, on which he prided himself so much, and in which he had hoped and expected to find himself sustained by Strauss, parted like a rope of sand. Having read the last page, he exclaimed, 'I thank thee, Strauss; thou hast been my salvation!'"

What Is It Like in Nature?

One beautiful summer day a lady was walking across the Capitol grounds in Washington, D. C., and seeing a tree in magnificent bloom, stepped upon the grass to examine it more closely. Immediately a police sergeant was at her side, and the lady expected to hear from him a request that she should "keep off the grass"; but not so. Instead, she was greeted with, "Lady, do you not think that is a beautiful tree?" "Yes," she replied, "I have been watching it many months; even in the winter when it had no leaves, I used to walk by it to see its beautiful branches. But now it is more beautiful than I have ever seen it." The officer picked off a bunch of the lavender blossoms, passed it to the lady and said, "I am no church member, but the other day, when I was looking at some of these flowers, and I noticed that each flower had the same little green lines against the lavender, I said to myself, 'Only God can make flowers that way.' And the lady passed on with a prayer that the man, who was "almost persuaded," might become an out-and-out follower of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The 1908 Catalogue of the Wilbur H. Murray Company, of Cincinnati, O., is an interesting publication. This company has built up a leading reputation in home and foreign trade on the strength, endurance and style of its vehicles, harnesses and equipments for twenty years. Its products are recognized as standard at home and abroad, especially in South American territory. They have the reputation of being "always better than they look," a phrase which people who constantly use carriages for business or pleasure understand to mean the highest kind of praise, which is only given to carriages that in style and finish are exquisitely perfect. The Wilbur H. Murray Company is perhaps the largest exporter of vehicles and harnesses in the United States. It is a proud and no doubt justifiable claim that "they have never had one dissatisfied customer." Standard merit and square dealing always command in the home or foreign market. This is an instructive illustration of fair dealing in a business where American manufactures are sold on honor.

Without fear of successful contradiction we claim that the Ostermoor Mattress, $15 Is Better than all Others for these very Pertinent Reasons:

- MOST COMFORTABLE bed ever slept on—soft, yielding, but springy and resilient—never packs or gets lumpy, or loses its feeling of newness. That is because it is made up of hand-laid Ostermoor sheets—built, not stuffed. We have scores of letters from doctors and competent judges, who declare it the only
- ABSOLUTELY SANITARY mattress, because dust cannot work into it; no vermin can live in it; an occasional sun-bath is all the renovating it ever needs; it will not absorb dampness, disease germs, or any poison from perspiration or the atmosphere. It is always
- PERFECTLY DRY because non-absorbent. If the ticking is dry, the mattress is dry. No taking cold from it, no rheumatism, no musty odor about it; always fresh and sweet. Testimonials in our free book bear witness from those who have used it for thirty years or more and who do not hesitate to say that it
- LASTS A LIFETIME and stays in perfect condition. It never needs or costs a cent for remaking or renovating. You may remove and clean the tick as often as you like.

No other mattress in the world, of any material, at any price from any maker or through any dealer, can TRUTHFULLY make and prove all these claims as can the Ostermoor. Do not take our word for it—our word is good—but if you will the proof is there, from U.S. Government tests and reports, letters from prominent men and women, and the testimony of schools, hotels, hospitals and steamships, where extraordinary service is required. The book is handsome as well as convincing; contains over 200 illustrations—about beds of all ages; about sleep and its lack (insomnia); about mattress-hair—some things will be surprising, and you will wish you had known them long ago. Of course, it also explains the merits and styles of Ostermoor Mattresses, Church Cushions, etc. This book costs you a postal card—don't you wish a copy? With it we send free samples of ticking for your selection.

OLD SURGEON Found Coffee Caused Hands to Tremble.

The surgeon's duties require clear judgment and a steady hand. A slip or an unnecessary incision may do irreparable damage to the patient.

When he found that coffee drinking caused his hands to tremble, an Ills. surgeon conscientiously gave it up and this is his story.

"For years I was a coffee drinker until my nervous system was nearly broken down, my hands trembled so I could hardly write, and insomnia tortured me at night.

"Besides, how could I safely perform operations with unsteady hands, using knives and instruments of precision? When I saw plainly the bad effects of coffee, I decided to stop it, and three years ago I prepared some Postum, of which I had received a sample.

"The first cupful surprised me. It was mild, soothing, delicious. At this time I gave some Postum to a friend who was in a similar condition to mine; from the use of coffee.

"A few days after, I met him and he was full of praise for Postum declaring he would never return to coffee but stick to Postum. We then ordered a full supply and within a short time my nervousness and consequent trembling, as well as insomnia disappeared, blood circulation became normal, no dizziness nor heat flashes.

"My friend became a Postum enthusiast, his whole family using it exclusively.

"It would be the fault of the one who brewed the Postum, if it did not taste good when served.

"The best food may be spoiled if not properly made. Postum should be boiled according to directions on the package. Then it is all right, anyone can rely on it. It ought to become the national drink." "There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

A MASTERFUL MAN

BY MRS. SUSAN M. GRIFFITH

"THERE'S the postman!" said Pearl, running to the front door and returning with a letter in her hand.

"Only just one!" she exclaimed with a pout. "And for mother! I thought surely I'd hear from Lenore Wilde today. She said she'd stop over here for a day or two on her way home, and see me, and would write and tell me the date. I haven't seen her for an age. What's the matter, mamma? Trying to find out who the letter is from without opening it? You are the funniest woman."

"I was just studying the post-mark a bit," said Mrs. Randall, rubbing her spectacles with a corner of her gingham apron; "but it's not plain. The handwriting ain't a mite familiar. I don't know who in the world it can be from."

"May I politely suggest that you open the missive and look at the signature? Possibly that may throw some light on the mystery," said David, with an amused twinkle in his dark blue eyes. "It beats all, mother, what an extraordinary pleasure you take in guessing. I believe you would have made a good try at Samson's riddle."

"I wouldn't have done just like them Philistines, anyway," said Mrs. Randall. "They had to get a woman to coax it out of him at last. I think I'd have held on to my thinking-cap a little longer. Let me see!" peering still inquiringly at the envelope. "H—O—P—now I've got it! Why, it's Hopewell, children; it must be something concerning your Uncle Joseph Byxbee."

"I hope not," observed Pearl. "I never want to hear from him, the old hermit and miser."

"Tut, tut!" said her mother, reprovingly. "Get the scissors so I can open it; no, you shan't tear it; you may pull off some of the writing and spoil the sense. How ruthless and reckless you are, Pearl."

Pearl laughed and brought the scissors, and David, who was just graduated from the theological seminary and awaiting a "call," returned to his book on homiletics. The mother painfully perused her letter, which was no easy task, as she was near-sighted. A sudden exclamation made the children give attention once more.

"Well, I never!" said she. "It's right hard to make out, but as near as I can read it, your Uncle Joseph is right bad off sick, and there ain't a soul to do a thing for him. He won't have no one around for fear he'll have to pay 'em, and he's in a dreadful state alone by himself. The letter is from a neighbor who thought it no more'n right to let me know, seeing I'm a half sister."

"Well, it won't do an atom of good," sniffed Pearl in disgust. "You can't go and look after him; he wouldn't allow you to if you made the attempt. His house must be a perfect hog-pen. Why, mamma, how long has he lived on that little old place near Hopewell all by himself?"

"Oh, it must be nearly twenty years."

"And he's rich, too, isn't he?" "Why, I suppose he is," said her mother reflectively; "folks say so, but I guess nobody really knows. He lives poor enough, the dear knows; wears scarecrow clothes, and eats only what he can raise on his bit of a place. I never was there; Joseph never had no use for me, nor I for him. I don't see what I can do for him, and yet it does seem mighty inhuman to let him lie there and starve to death."

"Now, mother, let your son solve this riddle for you," said David, quietly, possessing himself of the letter and reading its contents. "I am of the opinion that this is in my line; a field of labor for me. If you'll kindly put a few clean things in my suit-case, mother, I'll run down to Hopewell and see what I can do for this ill-conditioned relative of yours. It may be that I can do a bit of work for the Master."

"You, David, you!" exclaimed his mother. "Why, if there's any one that he hates on earth, it's a preacher. My! he'll run you right out in no time."

"He can't if he is confined to his bed. And as for the hating, that's nothing. We preachers have to expect that. You know what the Master said: 'Marvel not that the world hate you. It hated me before it hated you. If ye were of the world, the world would love its own; but because I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you.' Get the grip ready, mother, I'm going."

"Good for you, David Randall!" said Pearl. "Let him go, mother; he's just the very one. Just remember it was a David that slew that old giant Goliath. Uncle Joseph has always been your giant, mother, and the terror and disgrace of the Randall household. Let David beard him in his den and destroy him forever with the sword of the Spirit. I believe he can do it; why, yes; what else is a minister for?"

It was late in the afternoon of the same day, a pleasant day in June, when David Randall swung off the train at the pretty town of Hopewell. It was necessary to make inquiries as to the route he must take in order to reach his uncle's dwelling, which he knew was some distance from the village, on the edge of a desolate wood, entirely off from any road. Before instituting any especial search, however, he visited several stores and made certain purchases, looked up the writer of the letter and held a consultation with her, and then picked his way through dusty weeds and thickets of briars to the mean-looking house, hardly deserving to be called a house at all, which he had been told was occupied by Joseph Byxbee. As he reached it, a singular whining drone arrested his attention, and he stood listening, a grim humorous smile overspreading his face as he called to mind old Bill Barley in Great Expectations, for the refrain was very like to his, interspersed with the same kind of wishes to his fellow-men as that noted character indulged in. Thus:

"Here I be, hard and fast, with the hand of death a clutchin' at my throat. Here I be, treed like a squirrel, knocked down flat as a pancake, old Joseph Byxbee, aged sixty-nine. I ain't never done nothin' to nobody; I've let folks be and stayed by myself, yet here I be, laid low, with no one to keer a red cent fur me. Heigho! this here's the end. I reckon Joseph Byxbee's goin' into the earth to feed the worms. Ha, la! ho, ho! that's a fine endin' to the Creator's masterpiece, now, ain't it? A human feedin' the worms! Oh, my eye!"

David pushed open the half closed door and stepped into the room; a dirty, forlorn, wretched room it was, too; almost entirely bare of furniture; cobwebs hanging in long, hideous festoons from ceiling and corners; uncurtained windows, and a desperately filthy bed on which lay an old man with wild, gray locks and gaunt, pinched face and skeleton fingers. His shirt hung upon him in rags and tatters, and the bed-clothes were a sickening, demoralizing sight. But David did not flinch. Laying his suit-case and a large bundle on a chair, he approached the bed. "How are you, Uncle Joseph?" he said kindly, touching the old man's skinny hand. Joseph Byxbee stared at him with a hard look in his cold eyes.

"Who be ye?" he snarled with wild-cat ferocity.

"Your nephew, David Randall," said the young man quietly. "We heard today, for the first, of your condition, and I came to take care of you. You must have a bath, and your bed must be changed at once. And the house must be thoroughly aired and cleaned without delay. It is unsanitary."

"It's what?" demanded the old man, with a string of words frightful to hear, as David, paying no attention to in, flung wide the door, and threw up the windows.

"It is not healthy," said David, with a cherry whistle. "The atmosphere is enough to make any one ill. You must have fresh air to breathe, and God's sunshine to heal you, else your chances are small indeed."

"You you—you! What business have you coming here and meddling?" The old man was fairly choking with rage, his eyes burned and glared, and he was, altogether, a horrid spectacle as he tried vainly to rise from the bed. He fell back with a groan, and David calmly drew off his coat and hung it out doors in a bush. Then he proceeded to make a fire in the adjoining room. Old Joseph heard him breaking some ancient chairs for kindling, whistling cheerily as he went, and growled out unutterable words. In a short time David came in, his feet rolled to his elbow, and a tub of hot water. Going to the big bundle he had brought, he produced soap, towels, sheets, pillow-slips and clothing. Then he took the rags off the emaciated old man without ceremony, and proceeded to give him such a bath as he had never had in the whole course of his life. Sighs and groans filled and fouled the air, but David went calmly on with his vigorous scrubbing as if nothing unusual was occurring. Finally, too exhausted to struggle further, either with voice or hands, the old man submitted and the bath progressed rapidly.

"That's right," said David, "just you keep still and this business will soon come to a successful finish. You see, I am to take care of you, I must do it in my own way, and I insist on your being clean. When you get clean things out of your bed and clean clothes on your body, you'll feel like a new man. And as soon as the woman comes that I have engaged, and the grocery wagon, we'll see you up a good meal and you'll go to sleep like a new-born baby."

"Woman! Grocery wagon!" screamed the old man, suddenly recovering his breath. "Who's goin' to pay? Not Joseph Byxbee! There ain't no money in this house! I swear it! Not a red cent!"

"There, there," said David, "don't get excited; I expect to cancel all bills." And he pulled a clean shirt over the tousled, damp, gray head. Then rolling him skillfully from side to side, he tore off the stretched bed-clothes, mentally resolving to make a bonfire in the back yard, and spread on the clean, cool, sweet-smelling sheets.

"You're a—mighty masterful young man," said the invalid feebly, interspersing the remark with various rough words. "I'd like right well to know your authority for doin' the like of this here."

"Shall I tell you?" asked David, beginning to comb out the wild, straggling gray hair. "My authority is Jesus Christ, the Saviour of men. The Father of all life sent him into this world to suffer and die for men like you and me, because he loved us so. And he has sent me, his servant, to carry on his work; and I am here to help him save you, body and soul."

"Humph!" grunted the old man, "you're a preacher, I reckon. I hate preachers!"

"So I have heard," said David, "but that does not matter. We hope to change all that in time."

With the arrival of the woman and the groceries the work of reformation went on apace. David went into the adjoining woods with an axe and brought a supply of wood to keep up the fire in the old stone fireplace. The walls were swept down, the floors scrubbed, the windows and woodwork likewise, and a cot and furnishings brought from the village for David to sleep on. A meal of toast and eggs and tea was prepared for the patient, who at first sulkily refused it, but something compelling in David's eyes, as well as the mastery of hunger, made him give way, and he ate ravenously.

Two weeks passed away, and David's kind care was rewarded by the complete recovery of his patient. More than that,

Joseph Byxbee was a very different man. He no longer railed and cursed at David, but followed him wistfully with his eyes, as he went about singing Gospel hymns, or sat reading his Bible, or engaged in silent prayer. One day he called to him softly.

"David, son, sit by, and read a bit out of the Good Book to me." And David read with a great prayer in his heart.

After that, it became a daily occurrence, and then, one night about twelve o'clock, David was awakened by the voice of prayer from the old man.

"Dear Lord Jesus Christ," he was saying tremulously, "you know I'm a dreadful old sinner, but if you want me, just take me, body and soul. But—but, Lord, I know you won't take me, if I don't give up the money. It's hid, Lord, all about the house, but I'll get it for you; I'll tell David. It most kills me to give it up, dear Lord Jesus, but I'm goin' to do it, now and evermore, because I love you and want to belong to you. Amen."

"Amen!" echoed David. And then, fearing to delay, the old man arose, and from a dozen different hiding-places brought out as many thousand dollars, laying them down before the young minister for the Lord and his work.

When David Randall returned home he took with him his uncle, Joseph Byxbee, and for twelve years he lived, an honored and beloved member of the household. To the day of his death he would never handle money, but left to David the entire dispensing of his funds. He adored David, and would sit in his big chair and watch the lithe young form swing down the street, an awed expression stealing into his face. Then he would murmur: "A masterful young man is David, my nephew. Here I be, a saved man, by the grace of God, and he did it—he brung me to the feet of Jesus, praise the Lord! Yes, David's a masterful man."

A Bomb Explodes in a Mission

THE "Black Hand" became a very real and tangible thing to the Home Garden Settlement, 405 East One Hundred and Sixteenth Street, New York, when one evening not long ago a bomb was exploded in the doorway of the four-story building, while the superintendent, Miss Guyon, and the servants were asleep. The front of the building was wrecked to a large extent and much damage done to the surrounding tenements. The bomb exploded outwards, to which is due the escape from personal injury of those in the house. The Home Garden was founded in 1898 by Miss Anna C. Ruddy, who continued its superintendency until a year or two ago and is still active in its management. Miss Guyon, the present superintendent, was Miss Ruddy's assistant for seven years and holds to the traditions of love and good-will with which the work was begun. It is a work especially for Italian children (though many others come to it), and has aimed from the first to reach them solely through a spirit of love and good fellowship and by the general atmosphere of a real home.

The bomb, according to the police view, was not intended for the Settlement, but for an Italian contractor nearby. The blow is nothing short of a calamity to the Home Garden, which has been forced to make an appeal to its friends for help.

Famine Relief in Russia

At the last session of the Russian parliament before the Christmas holidays a famine appropriation of $7,500,000 was passed. This famine appropriation is double the amount originally proposed in the budget, and will be immediately available for the relief of about twelve provinces. An additional appropriation will be necessary later. A large part of the money is to be distributed through the zemstvos and other local organizations. This course will be adopted because the centralization of relief work showed the danger of abuses.

WHY WE GO TO CHURCH*

MANY and diverse would be the answers given to the question, even by intelligent Christians. Unhappily there are some who would have to have the question changed to, "Why we ought to go to church"; or even, "Why we neglect to go to church." It is remarkable how many would have to allege an excuse for staying away, that would not keep them from attending a place of amusement, or from going to business on a week day. A snow storm, a slight cold, the absence of the favorite preacher, etc., are reasons for staying at home, that are used by persons who keep secular engagements regardless of such matters. The tendency of our times is to a neglect of the church service, to a diminution of it to one service a week, and to an irregularity that has suggested the name of religious tramps, men who wander from one church to another without having any church home. It will be well if the selection of this topic by the League managers leads to a consideration of the subject that will result in reformation.

Apart from the main reasons for going to church, which are to be discussed in next week's meeting, there are several minor and incidental reasons. One of these is that we should go for the sake of example. If the Christian stays away from church, or allows a small obstacle to prevent his attendance, he creates an impression that will not fail to be perceived by young people and irreligious people. They think that if the Christian does not feel it incumbent to be present, they, too, may stay away. They need the teaching of the pulpit, perhaps more than he does, but they stay away as he does, and so the church suffers through its friends.

Then there is the spiritual uplift that comes from a church service. The contact with other Christians, the union in prayer and song is a stimulus that we cannot afford to miss. The delight in the society of God's people is a sign of a godly spirit, and brings its reward. Then, too, there is the need which the church service supplies of getting away from business ideas, from sordid thoughts into the spiritual realm, which is a preparation for another week's temptations and trials. These besides the supreme idea of duty.

CALLED HIGHER

Mrs. Susanna Warden, of Dallas, Tex., who died lately, was in her ninety-ninth year, having been born on the shores of Lake Champlain, in Vermont, on February 10, 1809. She was united in marriage to John Warden in 1826. This union was blessed by fourteen children, seven of whom are still living. Deceased was a shining example of true Christian womanhood. She retained her remarkable memory up to the day of her illness. She was of a kind and generous nature and never failed to exercise that deep charity so characteristic of intelligent and noble-minded people.

The Bread-Line at Close Range

(From the New York Times)

IT was 12 o'clock. The coffee and rolls would not be given out until 1. This was to make sure that those who applied at the Bowery Mission were really homeless, that there should be no make-believe, that none who could afford the price of a bed should take the bread from the mouth of the waif who must walk the streets or sleep in a doorway. A handful of these shivered beneath the half roof of the Mission Church, waiting for 1 o'clock. One hour to wait. The snow fell in big, soft flakes.

There is a certain mercifulness in the actual falling of the snow, for it is not until afterward, when the big soft flakes have turned to tiny, stinging needles, when they scream under foot in crystalized masses and hang to the ragged coat in icicles, that the real misery begins.

Ten minutes after 12.

The handful had grown to sufficient proportions to form in line. A certain etiquette exists in this line as in others. Those who come first take up their places directly opposite the cellar door that will open the way to coffee and rolls. The handful ranged in a bent line on the curb, each forming a human covering of the other from the cold.

They stood under the umbrella of the elevated that sheltered them with some show of charity, except in the event of the passing of a train, at which time the hurrying wheels sent furious flurries of snowflakes on their unprotected shoulders.

One hand washes the other. Some one had blundered, and the panic of the rich had extended to the army of the poor. The bread-line grew. From out their holes these homeless creatures crawled to the comfort of the coffee and the rolls.

One found a small curved plank, placed it over the pool of melted snow in which he stood, and rested on it for the protection of his ragged shoes. Courteously he offered part of it to the waif who served as his human covering.

Both stood out of the wet for a period of time until the plank should have soaked itself sufficiently for the penetrating of the perforations of the aged soles of their shoes.

Some found bits of kindling wood and started small fires on the curb, the upward flying flames of which served as footlights to accentuate the wildness of hungry eyes set in the frames of pallid faces.

The line continued to grow. It doubled itself in places on the curb. It extended now to Canal Street and around the corner, to the street below and around its corner.

It was a quiet line and well behaved. The panic of the rich screams out its pain to the world. The panic of the poor is still.

In the room back of the Mission Church there sat the men who had charge of the coffee and the rolls, the little kindly manager half nodding in his chair, the little weazened sailor who hands out the rolls from the bin dozing gently before the big round stove bleached white by the intensity of its own heat. The little man straightened out of his doze and looked at the nodding sailor.

"We'll have to turn them away to-night," he said. "There are only a thousand rolls. Last night we had to turn them away and the night before, and the night before that."

The sailor nodded back at him.

"Yes," said he; "we'll have to turn some of them away to-night."

Below in the basement two great barrels of coffee were steaming, ready to be put into pots for the cups. The rolls were piled high in a bin near the door, a thousand, no more. On a long table were ranged the big tin cups for the coffee, a thousand, no more.

It neared the hour of 1, and more than a thousand stood on the curb, the line doubling, extending far toward the second corner on Canal and that other street below.

Two men filled huge coffee pots from the steaming barrels. They began to pour the coffee into the cups. The long table served as a tray. They poured the coffee quickly and recklessly, but there was no waste, for beneath the spout of the table there stood another coffee pot to catch the drip.

At last it was 1 o'clock. All the cups were filled with the steaming coffee. The little old sailor took his seat on a counter by the bin, and the little man called out: "Open the door!"

Then down through the open door came the army of the poor to the coffee and the rolls, tramping, tramping.

The pallid faces of them! The hands outstretched for the rolls, the trembling lips pressed to the heat of the coffee in the cups. The misshapen hands, the grimy hands, the long, attenuated fingers, the cold, blue lips, the wolfish, backward look of the wild eyes at the pile of rolls, the fiendish stare of insatiable and unsatisfied hunger.

Down the cellar steps they tramped like herding cattle toward the grateful warmth of the cellar and the coffee and the rolls.

Outside, the onrush of the foremost of the line extended its eager trembling to the length of it. There were only a thousand rolls and many more than a thousand mouths. The frantic fingers of the two long arms of the line pushed the foremost down the steps to the coffee and the rolls, the thud of their tramping beating on the stillness of the night.

Again and again the little old sailor raked the rolls down to within his reach, picked out one at a time and gave it forth to the outstretched hand that snatched it, clawlike, after the fashion of a famished animal. Then on went the herd to the coffee cups, tramping, tramping, the thud of their footsteps beating on the quiet of the night.

Some drank the coffee in gulps, some drank it slowly as if loth to leave the comfort of its heat. Some thrust the roll into the pocket for later in the night, some had finished it before they reached the cup of coffee. Some passed around the long table and on out at the other door which led from the warmth of the cellar back to the night silently, sullenly, dazed by the despair of the hollow street. Some stopped and spoke to the little man and thanked him for the coffee and the rolls.

The bread was getting low in the bin.

"We will have to shut the door soon," said the little man, "and the line is long outside. It will not be many minutes now before we shall have to shut the door."

Outside the line had caught the fear of the shut door.

All at once, with a mighty movement, it rushed forward, and with a wild, still intensity pushed the foremost of the line down the steps in at the door. And then like a knell came the order: "Shut the door!"

The shut door pushed the mass of humanity back up the steps and into the street.

The staring eyes of them! The white, clutched hands of them! The wolfish look of unsatisfied hunger! The hopelessness! The despair!

[Since this article was written, the Bowery Mission Bread Line Supply has been doubled. Two thousand rolls and 2,000 cups of coffee are now served every night to the hungry and homeless men and lads.]

A Governor Kneels in Prayer

A touching scene occurred in Gov. Glenn's office at Raleigh, N. C., lately. Len Bennett, sixty-four years old, one of the two long-term convicts who received Thanksgiving pardons, went directly to the Governor's office. He thanked Gov. Glenn for his clemency and begged him to pray for him. The Governor agreed, and they both knelt in prayer. The Governor's prayer was most earnest and fervent. Bennett later went to the jail, prayed for the inmates, and advised them to lead good lives when their terms expired. The convicts were profoundly impressed.

What Will You Give To Be Well

I CANNOT tell you how happy I am that I have been able to bring health and strength to 30,000 women in the past six years. Just think! this means a whole city. It is to my thorough study of anatomy, physiology and health principles, and to my 12 years personal experience before I began my instructions by mail, that I attribute my marvelous success. It would do your heart good to read the reports from my pupils—and I have done all this by simply studying Nature's laws adapted to the correction of each individual difficulty.

To Have Good Figure, Vibrant Health, Rested Nerves?

If vital organs or nerve centers are weak, I strengthen them so that each organ does its work. I want to help every woman to be perfectly, gloriously well, with that sweet, personal loveliness which health and a wholesome, graceful body gives—a cultured, self-reliant woman with a definite purpose, full of the health and vivacity which makes you

A Better Wife
A Rested Mother
A Sweeter Sweetheart

You can easily remove the fat and it will stay removed. I have reduced 15,000 women.

Too Fleshy? One pupil writes me: "Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I feel so well I want to shout! I never get out of breath now."

"When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy, I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

I may need to strengthen your stomach, intestines and nerves first. A pupil who was thin, writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman."

"My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel so well all the time."

Write me today telling me your faults in health or figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you. I never treat a patient I cannot help. If I cannot help you I will refer you to the help you need.

Music Lessons Free

IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Are you interested in learning to play a musical instrument, whether a piano, organ, or an advanced player?

Now six lessons in a less than a year's time for either Piano, Organ, Violin, Guitar, Banjo, Cornet, Sight Singing or Mandolin will be given free to make our home study courses for these instruments known in your locality. You will get one lesson weekly, and your only expense during the time you take the lessons will be the cost of postage and the music you use, which is small. Write at once. It will mean much to you to get our free booklet. It will place you under no obligation whatever to us if you never write again. You and your friends should know of this work. Hundreds of our pupils write: "Wish I had known of your school before." "Have learned more in one term in my home with your weekly lessons than in three terms with private teachers, and at a great deal less expense." "Everything is so thorough and complete." "The lessons are marvels of simplicity, and my 11-year-old boy has not had the least trouble to learn." One minister writes: "As each succeeding lesson comes I am more and more fully persuaded I made no mistake in becoming your pupil."

"We have been established nine years—have thousands of pupils from eight years of age to seventy. Don't say you cannot learn music till you send for our free booklet and tuition offer. It will be sent by return mail free. Address U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC, Box 7—124 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

If you have any use for doors, windows, storm sash, moulding, porch brackets, columns and millwork, for your own buildings, or as contractor, don't buy elsewhere at any price or under any circumstances until you get the Grand Millwork Catalog which makes a clean saving of 50% on any dealer's prices. It makes no difference where you live. If you intend to build, or if you need millwork for any purpose, do not think of buying until you get our estimate. Our goods are high grade as well as wonderfully low in price. Our lumber is first air-dried and then, as an extra precaution, is put through a scientific drying process. Joists are made with heavy hardwood dowel pins, glue with imported glue, pressed together by heavy steam power press. There is no "come apart" to our work.

Door panels have a heavy raise on both sides. The panels are sandpapered on a special machine of our own invention before the door is put together, and the entire is then smoothed with fine-grained sandpaper. We guarantee to be strictly up to the official grade adopted by the Sash, Door & Blind Manufacturers' Association of the Northwest.

We operate the largest plant in the world—163,000 feet of floor space (four acres)—have been in business since 1885—own our own timber lands—sawmills and lumber yards. We carry a large stock and can therefore ship promptly. We have no traveling men—sell only for cash. We are the largest producers of sash, doors and blinds selling direct to the consumer. Our prices will astonish you. Don't buy anything in our line until you get our catalog, the grandest woodwork catalog published. It's Free—write for it today. Address too prone to fight and drink. The remedy for this is the Gospel—the only sufficient remedy for all sin and all men.

The manifest duty of all Christians is to remedy this state of things, by sending the Gospel to these neighbors. It is the only transforming power on earth. I do not undervalue other agencies, as schools, colleges, settlements, or secular societies. They are all good in their places; but they are powerless when men are to be transformed and society regenerated. The object of this Society is the salvation of the mountain people, not only from murder, but from other sins which prevail among them. It is a disgrace to them and to us also, if we do not help them. The people of the Cumberlands and Alleghenies can be made an orderly, peaceable, and God-fearing people. As it is, there are tens of thousands of them who never saw a church, or heard a Gospel sermon they could understand. This state of affairs is a blot and shame on the good name of our country. Let us remove it.

This America Inland Mission has over 100 missionaries now at work in the mountains of Kentucky, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia, and their support comes largely from good people all over the world who know the work and heartily approve of it.

EDWARD O. GUERRANT,
President, America Inland Mission.
Wilmore, Ky.

THE causes of the strifes and murders in the mountains are very different from those of the "night riders" in the western part of Kentucky and Tennessee. The latter are a protest on the part of the tobacco raisers against the oppression of the Tobacco Trust. The former are largely a result of feuds that grew out of the Civil War. Most of the mountain people were on the side of the Union, as there were hardly any slaves among them, and all their traditions were in favor of liberty.

After the war closed, the strife was continued by individuals in the mountains, and a feud, having started, was handed down in families, until at last a father has been killed not by one on the other side, but by his own son.

The whole police power of the great State of Kentucky has failed to eradicate the feuds. There is only one power that can do it—the Gospel.

Some twenty or twenty-five years ago, before the railroad was built, Rev. Edward O. Guerrant, D.D., of Wilmore, Ky., a gallant ex-soldier and preacher, came on horseback to Jackson, in Breathitt County, bringing a tent with him. There had been one hundred "killings" in that section. People did not dare go out of their homes at night. While the court was in session, the Governor had to send a company of militia to keep the peace. The night before Dr. Guerrant arrived, the mob took four men out of the jail and hanged them. There was not a church in the county.

Dr. Guerrant held meetings under his tent, and in ten days organized a church with over one hundred members. He got money to put up a building, and sent them a minister, and that church to-day is paying one thousand dollars a salary. He organized a college there that has developed finely. He went through the country with his tent and his Bible and organized seven churches, and Breathitt became as orderly for years as any county in the State, until this late feud broke out anew and stained the record with blood.

The Gospel is the best force to change and transform these mountain people in the South. They have been strangely neglected. Much has been done, but it is believed that there are still one million people there who have never had a church or preacher, except a few native workers.

The mountain people deserve better things and a better chance than they have had. They are of good blood. Their ancestors fought our battles during the Revolution. Many of them fought bravely during the Civil War. They welcomed eagerly the church and school. They are brave and hospitable and capable. This is the most needy, the most neglected, the most productive mission field on the Continent.

Ten years ago, Rev. Dr. Guerrant organized the America Inland Mission or Society of Soul Winners for pioneer work among these mountaineers. The one missionary of the first year has increased to more than one hundred the past year. The Mission is interdenominational and dependent on the free-will offerings of all of God's people. His blessing has been with it wonderfully. Perhaps there is not on this continent a field where so much can be done for so little, or where there may be such large returns.

One can have a missionary teacher for ten dollars a month, or build a home for a missionary for one hundred dollars, or a neat church for two hundred and fifty, or a dormitory for a college for two thousand. Every step in the direction of the Gospel or education helps to heal up the feuds, to banish ignorance and crime, and to develop the good qualities of a deserving people. REV. H. M. MOREY.

In the Bread-Line

IN the bread-line see them stand,
Gathered here from every land.
Faces marked with lines of care,
Some with signs of deep despair;
Hopeless faces though still young,
Tattered garments loosely hung.
Ghastly faces, hollow-eyed,
Who were once some mother's pride;
Homeless men out in the cold,
Wanderers from some dear home-fold;
See them standing there in line,
Showing want by many a sign.

Shall we turn us from their need
Giving them but little heed?
What if dear ones of our own
In some distant land, unknown,
Wait some day in such a line
Longing for some friendly sign?
Lest some others turn away
From our own on such a day,
Let us help them in their need,
Let us prove "a friend indeed."

HOT BISCUIT

Kind of Breakfast Passing Away.

The old-time hot biscuit played a prominent role in the breakfast bill of fare, along with fried potatoes, ham and eggs, and coffee.

The whiter and lighter the biscuit the more pleased the cook, which was usually Mother, who did the best she could, with her understanding of the matter.

But most people have learned in recent years, that white flour lacks the nourishing elements of the entire wheat berry, and many cases of imperfect nutrition follow its use.

In Grape-Nuts, all the food elements of wheat and barley are used, and this largely accounts for results similar to those given in the following letter:

"I wish to tell of the health and strengthening properties of Grape-Nuts. I am 45 years old and had for years been afflicted with indigestion and other stomach troubles, brought on by eating hot biscuit, white bread and improperly cooked cereals.

"Noticing an advertisement stating the benefits derived from eating Grape-Nuts, I was skeptical because I had tried so many so-called 'health foods.' I thought it would be useless to try Grape-Nuts.

"But during the last six months I have been eating it, my stomach has been the best for years, my mind clear; my nerves quiet and a feeling of buoyancy pervades my whole being.

"This I attribute to Grape-Nuts as I have left off using medicines. I now firmly believe in the brain-clearing, nerve-steadying and muscle-building properties of Grape-Nuts.

"I am healthier than I have been for years, weigh 180 lbs., which is more than ever before."

Sight for the Blind

By Mrs. M. BAXTER

WHEN Jesus left the temple, where the scribes and Pharisees had taken up stones to cast at him, he saw a man who was blind from his birth. No thoughts concerning his own safety hindered Jesus from his wonted compassion; it would not have been like him to pass this man by. Truly, the man had no other claim on Jesus but that of affliction on him who was anointed "to preach . . . recovering of sight to the blind" (Luke 4: 18).

The disciples had not entered into the force of their Lord's words, "God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved" (John 3: 17). They said, "Master, who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" Jesus answered, "Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents; but that the works of God should be made manifest in him." Jesus did not say, "He has not sinned," nor yet "his parents have not sinned"; but that, even if they had, the point now was, "that the works of God should be made manifest in him." It was as much as to say, "You have not to be occupied with the cause of this blindness, but to see that the man be brought into contact with him who opens the eyes of the blind." No sickness or physical infirmity could have existed if sin had never existed; but the part of Christ's disciples is, not to judge sufferers, but to bring them to Jesus. Suffering is by no means always the result of the sin of the sufferer or of his parents.

Jesus continued, "As long as I am in the world, I am the Light of the world." And this he said in connection with the opening of the eyes of the blind! Accordingly, he who is light itself, "spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and he anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay, and said unto him, Go, wash in the Pool of Siloam. He went his way therefore, and washed, and came seeing."

"There, you see," say many, "Jesus used means, and blessed them, in the healing of the sick; he used the clay for the blind man, and saliva is an excellent thing for the eyes." Oh, how short-sighted is human reasoning! Surely, if clay made of saliva had in itself the property of curing birth-blindness, it would be now commonly in use, and institutions for the blind would be done away with. In this case, however, the man was healed, not by the clay, but by the Lord. It was indeed a great test of faith, that, being born blind, he should be rendered doubly so by the clay, and then directed to go to the Pool of Siloam. But the man trusted Jesus to tell him the right thing to do, and he did it in all simplicity, and was healed.

But a great stir was raised in the neighborhood. The neighbors began talking among themselves as to the man's identity; but he soon settled that, by himself telling them that he was the man who before was blind; and, moreover, he related the circumstances of his healing. But the Pharisees felt it was only right that they, the great religionists of the day, should judge about this unusual matter. No one attempted to say that the man was deluded, and that he could not see after all; but they could not make up their minds that it was quite right he should be healed. So he underwent an examination by the Pharisees, who, at last, discovered a flaw in the proceeding. It was the Sabbath day when Jesus made the clay and opened his eyes, so some of them pronounced the verdict, "This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the Sabbath day."

How would it have been if the high priest or one of the Pharisees had had power to open his eyes? They had settled to their own perfect satisfaction that Jesus was a sinner, but still they could not undo the fact that he had opened the eyes of a man born blind, and they could not hinder others from saying, "How can a man that is a sinner do such miracles?" So they attempted to disprove that the man was born blind. They sent for his parents, questioned them circumstantially, and got their testimony that he was born blind, and that now he could see.

But the parents knew the threat of the Pharisees, that if any man acknowledged Jesus to be Christ, he should be excommunicated, or put out of the synagogue—the greatest public disgrace which could happen to any Jew, and they were not prepared to face anything which cost so much; and therefore, they refused all testimony as to how their son's sight had been given, and said, "He is of age, ask him, he shall speak for himself."

Wise Use of Money*

WISDOM in the use of money is largely determined by the quantity of it there is to use. Where there is so little of it that there is barely enough to cover the actual necessities of shelter, food and clothing for the family, as is the case with a large and rapidly increasing part of the population, the wisest use of money is to provide necessities and avoid the purchase of luxuries of all kinds. Where there is a little more money, the margin would be wisely used in making provision for sickness or old age. Where the income is largely in excess of the need, there is opportunity for charity, for helpfulness and beneficence that may bring a blessing to giver and recipient. It is, we presume, such circumstances that the Committee had in mind in choosing the subject.

Our Lord's remark, that it was "more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts 20: 35), though it applied to other matters beside money, applied to that certainly. There are few who have no desire to share in that blessing. There are none that have made the experiment who have not proved its truth, and it is a noteworthy fact that a gift which involves self-denial on the part of the giver, is that which brings the greatest blessing. Apart from the benefit to the recipient or of his gratitude, apart from the question of duty to God, the gift that costs the giver some personal sacrifice, brings to him a satisfaction which can come to him in no other way. This is a luxury peculiar to the poor and the rich cannot know it. The delight of adding to a hoard, or of piling up a fortune, is not to be compared to the pleasure that comes from using money that we need ourselves, and denying ourselves an indulgence that we may help another.

Until the ideal time comes when the products of the soil and of industry are so distributed as to give every man his share, not an excess to one and a bare subsistence to another, it is only by charity that the rich can escape the penalty of injustice. Charity is a poor substitute for justice, but it is the only one available under present conditions. There must be shame to the conscientious man in keeping for his own use funds far in excess of his wants, when his brother is starving or has a wife and children starving. He cannot by himself remedy the injustice, but the least he can do is to give of his abundance to relieve the ever present poverty and distress. Thus charity in existing circumstances is the wisest use of money until we reach a state in which charity gives place to justice.

Questions and Answers

M. A. E., Auburn, Ind. Is the "sex drama" a thing to be tolerated, under existing laws, in New York?

It is a comparatively recent development and is decidedly immoral in its tendencies and teachings, and consequently unfit to be patronized by Christian people.

Reader, White Pine, Tenn. Is it right or wrong to patronize palmists and astrologers?

These are pseudo-sciences, and are chiefly practised by charlatans, who prey upon the credulous. All who profess to foretell the future may be safely set down as humbugs. In some States they are prohibited by law.

Reader, Pottstown, Pa. At what age has a boy a right to earn and save money for himself?

It depends upon circumstances. If the boy is put to work in order to help the household at home, his first duty lies there, and he will have comparatively little for himself beyond actual necessities. If, however, there is no urgent need at home, he should be taught to economize his expenditures and to begin saving as soon as possible. Many a boy of sixteen, by industry and economy, has already laid the foundation of a future competence.

J. A. S., Canada. 1. What does the Angelus mean? 2. Is the name attached to your calendar the surname or Christian name?

1. The Angelus is a prayer to the Virgin, instituted by Pope Urban II. The sounding of the bell, which summons people to this prayer, is also known as the Angelus. 2. Christian name.

D. C., New Lexington, O. Where did Simon Stylites stand on a pillar thirty-six years?

Simeon the Stylite (or Simeon Stylites), (Simeon of the Pillar), was a Syrian Christian, who lived in the fifth century A.D. He adopted a monastic life, and was an extreme ascetic, living in a hut on the side of a mountain, and undergoing long fasts and severe penances. He erected a pillar, thirty-six cubits high, on top of which, it is said, he spent the last thirty years of his life. His followers became a distinct order or sect by themselves.

Subscriber, Watertown, S. D. In what States is there a law prohibiting the marriage of first cousins?

In the following States marriages between first cousins are prohibited:

Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Washington and Wyoming.

Wray B., Newark, O. I enclose list of the leading modern miracles which have made the twentieth century what it is. When I was born (1830), we had no modern science. Later, I taught modern science for twenty years in our American colleges.

1493, printing; 1492, America discovered; 1517, the Reformation, Copernican system introduced; 1535, the first English Bible; 1588, the Spanish Armada sunk (129 ships); 1590, telescope; 1607,

D. C., New Lexington, O. 1. Were not Joseph and Mary first cousins? If so, was not their marriage illegal? 2. Do persons obtain blessings by prayer because they pray aright rather than because of their impurity?

1. What makes you think they were cousins? We know of no passage implying it. Besides, there was no prohibition in the law of cousins marrying. 2. They obtain the blessing because what they ask is in accord with the will of God. It is conceivable that where a person is very importunate in prayer, God may grant the request, and it may be bad for the person who prayed. God gives him his desire to

A number of readers have expressed their views regarding the novel proposition of Miss Arbella Saddlemire (in THE MAIL-BAG of February 19), that the "best way to stop the flood of poor people is for Legislatures to pass laws that no man shall marry until he has at least $2,000 at interest and until he is twenty-five or thirty years old and in a position to keep a family, and no girl until she is twenty-three or twenty-five and has things to keep house with." Miss Saddlemire contended that such a law would make a better people and would wipe out the slums.

J. P. K., Mechanicsburg, Pa., writes:

Marriages will take place, no matter what laws may be enacted. One month after marriage the $2,000 may be gone. What then? Is marriage only for the rich?

J. M. J., Cedar Falls, Ia., writes:

A reasonable property qualification should be required of one before marrying; but that would not be a guarantee that he or his family might not become a public charge. The only effectual way

Does she know of the many hundred well-mated, deserving people that were married at twenty with just a few dollars and lived to celebrate their golden wedding, reared large families and were happy with their lot?

C. A. B., Knoxville, Ill., writes:

I like her idea of the girls having money of their own at the time of marriage. It looks as though she was or is a "help-meet" and not a "help-eat." We have in Illinois a sect of Germans known as "New Omish," who are not allowed to marry unless both of the couple are of sound mind and capable of providing for the family. Result: no paupers amongst them; all have homes of their own.

George D. D., Hampton Falls, N. H., writes:

I have never read a more Utopian suggestion than that of Miss Saddlemire. It would have eliminated Lincoln, most of his class, and the nation itself. Some of the best of men are destitute of the faculty of acquisitiveness. Hasten prohibition and make education more practical for both men and women. Let God's plans alone. Celibacy is already too prevalent.

M. E. C., Olympia, Wash., writes:

If I were in her State I would try and help her to start the ball a-rolling. I was married in 1874. My husband was twenty-nine, I was twenty-seven. He had $1,000, all bringing ten per cent. interest. With thrifty habits it is easy to keep out of the slums. If such a law was passed as she suggests, it might prove an incentive to young men to cultivate more thrifty habits.

G. R., Newark, N. J., writes:

I notice Miss Saddlemire's suggestion and wish to protest against such a law being even hinted at, as I can only see the evil of it. Take the large number of people who work for $10 or $12 per week. How do you suppose they ever will save up $2,000 and wait until they are thirty years old before marrying, except in very isolated cases? I venture to say that three-fourths of them will take to evil and make the slums just so much worse. Again, I think that when a man from nineteen to twenty-three years old marries, it is the best thing he can do, as it is the time when he turns, and he is the better for it, if he has been inclined to be reckless.

W. A. C., Lyndon, Kan., writes:

Her proposition would bar from the marriage relation four-fifths of those who now marry; for very few young people lay by much money until they are married. Were the restriction she names imposed, it would drive thousands of people into either licentiousness or common-law marriage.

A Word of Caution

Some of the advertisers in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD say that among the many replies received from our readers, some of them forget to sign their names to their letters. The Western Newspaper Association, of 234 Dearborn Street, Chicago, for instance, say that they have a large number of the coupons cut from their page advertisements unsigned; consequently no doubt many of our readers are wondering why they do not hear from these advertisers. If you have written to any of our advertisers and have not yet received a reply, perhaps this may be the reason, and we would suggest that you address a postal at once to such advertiser, being sure to sign your name.

A VISIT TO AFRICAN KINGS

Missionaries Discover Tribes Which Have Never Heard the Gospel and Dusky Royalty Welcomes Them

THAT large tracts of territory in the interior of Africa are yet unevangelized, and that many thousands—possibly millions—of the dark-skinned tribesmen have never heard the Gospel and know nothing of a Saviour, is disclosed in letters that come to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from missionaries now laboring in Rhodesia and other parts of the "Dark Continent." This may surprise many, in view of the remarkable progress of missionary work; but the truth that there are many tribes still in heathen darkness should not discourage the friends of missions, but should rather inspire them to renewed effort for the complete evangelization of those regions of sin and superstition.

Concerning the rapid growth of the general work now conducted by our American missionaries in Zambesia, Rhodesia, Angola, the Congo and other parts of Africa, the most encouraging letters are received by this journal.

At Inhambane, the mission over which Dr. E. R. Richards has charge has now over twenty out-stations. The missionaries publish a paper called Kuca Ka Miso (The Morning Dawn), in three languages. At New Umtali, Missionary Wodehouse is supported by a most active corps of workers. Occasional letters from this missionary have appeared in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. This mission has now two churches and an academy for whites and several churches and schools for the natives. It has two large out-stations and fifteen other places, where regular Gospel services are held. In addition to these, the mission has a farm of some three thousand acres, part of which is under cultivation.

Mr. Shirley D. Coffin, missionary at Old Umtali, Rhodesia, writes picturesquely of the work among the kraals and native villages in that vast region. At almost all of these the mission bands are warmly welcomed. On a recent tour Mr. Coffin's party had many strange experiences. It is a country in which elephants, leopards, lions, monkeys, deer, snakes and crocodiles abound. One hundred and fifty kraals were visited and the Gospel was preached to 25,000 souls, of whom more than 20,000 heard it for the first time in their lives.

During this tour the kraals or headquarters of a number of petty kings or chiefs were visited. Some of these kraals have as many as 1,000 huts and 5,000 population, forming good-sized villages. One of the dusky monarchs—Mangwende by name—who had the reputation of being a "bad native," treated them very hospitably, but wanted to smash the missionary's camera with an axe, being very superstitious. Another king, Merawa, gave them presents of food and said he wanted a missionary for his people. They held a meeting at his kraal, at which 3,000 natives heard the Gospel and were taught to sing Christian hymns.

They found many kraals where the name of God had never been heard and to whose people the Gospel message was a new revelation. With a native guide, Mr. Coffin ascended a small hill, from which there were pointed out to him ten kraals or villages, whose thousands of inhabitants were still strangers to the Gospel.

One heathen chief, after listening to the missionary, said: "I have lived many years and am an old man now. I have wondered who made the world and all that I see, and what was to become of us. I have been afraid of death. Now I am glad you have told me of all this." Could there be a more pathetic appeal from one who had spent his life in heathen darkness?

There were certain kraals, however, in which the greeting was not so reassuring. Tall warlike natives, some more or less intoxicated, wearing only skin loin-cloths, with brass rings on arms and legs, and feathers in their hair, and carrying axes, spears and knives, surrounded the missionaries. The native baggage-carriers were afraid to go forward, but the workers themselves were divinely protected, and even in these warlike camps some good seed was sown. In some sections the natives found were of a wild, primitive type, living in caves and the thick bush, too savage even to cultivate the soil, and subsisting on fruit, roots and small animals. One African king, Mpeko, met them with fifty of his chiefs and headmen in imposing array. The workers told the Gospel story to those wild children of nature and got them deeply interested. Another chief, named Katia, said to his men, "You hear what the white stranger says?" and they muttered with one voice in reply, "It is good, it is good!" and all shook hands with the visitors. In this king's kraal, all that night, hundreds sat in circles, hearing the preached word and singing hymns, Katia himself standing by the missionaries' side, motioning dignifiedly with his hands for silence and attention. Katia, it should be explained, is a monarch with twenty-eight wives.

One of the least agreeable personages encountered was a chief named Nyrgena, a wild-looking creature, huge of limb, with a striking head-dress, brass rings, leopard-skin cloak, axe, spears and knife—a savage through and through. "Yes, I know you," he said to the missionary; "you take our country and make us pay tax. You say you are a friend, like all white men, who at first speak good words until they have what they want; then they are thieves and liars." After a while he became better natured, and accepted some food. Yet as the missionary left, he said: "It is going to rain. I hope you will get wet."

Dukoo was a different type—a fine-looking monarch, with much native dignity, attended by a headman, or undana, a sort of interpreter. He became greatly interested in the Gospel story, and accompanied the strangers three miles on their journey, asking questions all the way.

One of the plagues of African travel is the ants. Even the natives say "our huts bite," meaning they were swarming with the insects. At different times they caused

Church Financiering

TEXT—Prov. 21: 26
“The righteous giveth and spareth not”

THE simple life of the early Christians, when they had everything in common, was adequate to the infancy of the Church for a very brief period only, but inadequate to its requirements further on. It was probably as hard for some followers of the Master to give up leaky boats, and time-worn nets, because it was their all, as for Matthew to relinquish a good clerkship in the Custom House. Church financiering was comparatively easy where the preacher was satisfied to be sower, reaper, thresher, miller and baker, by rubbing the wheat grains out in his palm, and being content with such a meal eaten while he walked. He was his own steward, trustee, treasurer and banker. All of these offices were easily filled, where bread and meat in the form of manna and quails came daily with the dew; or where the crows had a special commission, like that to Elijah, to provide for daily wants. Church financiering was also simplified where the oil barrel was miraculously replenished for the mere asking.

Our lot, however, is cast in a different period in the world's history. Ours is a different, not to say a better, type of civilization, from any that has preceded it. And yet the birds and the dews still feed us, and the olive and the oil are still miraculously multiplied by Him who sends the former and the latter rain, the seed-time and the harvest.

Essential Partnership

In a sense, we still have everything in common. One man furnishes brain, another brawn. The skill of the architect, the builder, the artist, the factory expert is set over against the money of the man who knows how to get it, save it, and spend it. The time of the employee is pooled with the money of the employer. They are brethren, co-partners, mutual helpers, and palsied be the wagging tongue that would set the classes against the masses, or the masses against the classes. It is still true that “The laborer is worthy of his hire”; still true that we have everything in common. The head cannot say to the foot or the hand, “I have no need of thee,” nor can the eye say to the ear, “I have no need of thee.” The conductor is dependent on the engineer, he on the fireman, and all three on the brakeman and flagman, the switch-tender and the track-walker. And the passenger's life hangs on the integrity and fidelity of each separately, and not only so, but upon the conscientious co-operation of all, and of a hundred and one other partners in the “all things in common.” And so it is through all the marvelously intricate and mysterious ramifications of what we call “modern life.” Partners multiply with each added link to the ever-lengthening chain of our high-pressure civilization.

With such alarming rapidity have organizations multiplied to emphasize and facilitate the theory of “everything in common,” that the student of sociology must needs rub his filmed eyes and prick open his dull ears. It goes without saying that this sociological disorder, this materialistic mania, this communistic malaria, has not only made sad inroads on individual devotions and family altars and the religious and social gatherings of the Church, but has, in too many instances, abridged, if not destroyed, the home life. Those who in our day clamor for the equal division of property, and for the good old Pentecostal times when men had literally all things in common, forget utterly, that under the most favorable conditions, that supposably ideal policy probably did not last a year. For as the number of the disciples multiplied, there arose a murmuring of the Greeks against the Jews because their widows were neglected in the daily ministrations. Then the preachers of that day, seeing and feeling helpless to stem it, called the people together, literally the whole congregation, and said, “It is not reason that we should leave the word of God, and serve tables. Wherefore, brethren, look ye out among you seven men, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom, whom we may appoint over this business. But we will give ourselves continually to prayer and to the ministry of the word.”

The Church has sought to stem the tide of worldliness by organizing counter attractions, such as church theatricals, lotteries, and appeals to the stomach; also by establishing the institutional church, where all of human wants, physical, intellectual and moral, are supplied, not forgetting man's need of recreation and amusement. It has appealed to the youthful and masculine love of strife by establishing military organizations among the boys, where the rattle of the kettle drum, the clash of steel sabres, the click of the rifle and the military command, contrast strangely enough with the philosophy of him who said, “Put up thy sword.” “Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you.” It is in sharp contrast, too, with this International Peace Conference held in the hope of establishing arbitration in lieu of the arbitrament of the sword. Large amounts of money that should go to the church, now go to clubs, lodges and orders.

The Larger Resources

Perhaps in nothing has the materialistic tendency of the age, somewhat Christianized to be sure, been more manifest, than in an attempt to raise and expend money for educational, benevolent and eleemosynary purposes. Millions on millions now replace the contributions of the dimes and dollars of a half century ago. Yet, let it not be forgotten that the old-time Christians were heroes, and gave as a rule “till they felt it.” They gave outright of their time, their best thought, their prayers, their tears, their labors and their money. Their homes were ever open to the minister and his family, including his faithful and indispensable horse. The “prophet's room” was ever ready and often filled. Let us honor the memory of our fathers. They were men of whom the world was not worthy, and in some respects the former times were better than these times; for character cannot be purchased by money, and is frequently the product largely of environment. Struggle makes character, and our fathers were compelled to struggle, in order to lay the foundations on which we of the twentieth century are so proudly building. Yet, with all our backslidings, and heart-wanderings, and degeneracy, who so foolish as to want to exchange the present for the past, or the men of to-day for those of yesterday?

We have greatly improved in the matter of church financiering at some points, but have we not at other points deteriorated? The Jews gave their tenth, the early Christians gave more; do we do as well? The command of Jehovah, four hundred years before Christ, was, “Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it.” Ah! There is no provision there for a church supper, or an oyster stew, or a lunch, or for a fish-pond or grab-bag lottery. No provision for the Church merchandizing in ice cream to freeze you, or coffee to warm you, or pickles to sour you, or taffy to sweeten you. No “tailing the donkey,” no sham marriage or euchre party, with a price for admission. Every offer of a saucer of ice cream, or a lady's fancy purse, or a comic church show in exchange for a contribution to Christ's kingdom is a deliberate discounting of Christ's cause. Such money-raising practically says: “The Church of Christ is not worth supporting; but it has got to be supported, so buy this thing, almost getting your money's worth, and we will turn over the profit to the Church.” Or, it is equivalent to saying, “The Church is worth supporting, but we don't give you credit for believing it, or for any willingness to help in its support, so we offer you something that will appeal to you.” Such an appeal is to his disciples, “Freely ye have received, freely give.” One has properly asked, “What would be our estimate of Moses, if in the account of the building of the old tabernacle of the Hebrews, which cost a large sum of money, you should read something like the following: And Moses called unto him Bezaleel and Aholiab, and saith unto them, ‘Go to now, let us get up an entertainment, a grand festival with a manna supper and roast quails in abundance. We may also have games and music and dancing, or a kissing frolic. And let sundry beautiful damsels scour the neighboring country selling tickets, and by the payment of a shekel each, let the people vote as to the most beautiful woman in the village.’”

If it is right to raise money for church repairs by means of concerts or appeals to the eye or the stomach, why not right and expedient to raise money for the pastor and the missionary in the same way? Some one has suggested a paraphrase like the following of the preacher's announcement to his congregation as throwing some light on the subject: “The stewards will now serve ice cream to those whose hearts are moved in this congregation in behalf of the perishing souls in heathendom. The ice cream is of three flavors, of good quality, and two spoons are with each glass. Brethren and sisters, invest for the cause of missions. Think of the souls in danger of perdition, and take at least one glass apiece; two, if your own souls are greatly moved.” Permit me to say that there is presumptive proof that the whole business of selling animals in the temple for sacrifice, and of changing money as a convenience to tribute payers, was done by the authorized collectors of religious offerings, and that the profits were a portion of the religious revenues of the temple establishment. The Master's vehemence, as with a whip made of short, knotted ropes he beat the desecrators out of the temple and overturned the tables of the money-changers, was directed against a pernicious, enervating, reverence-destroying system of church finance, rather than against the individuals engaged in the desecration.

Indirect Support

I know a church, and it is one of many scattered far and near. Ten years ago, its financial management fell into the hands of a young layman and his wife, both most excellent and self-sacrificing persons, but, unconsciously perhaps, selfishly ambitious to run things. Through all these years, there has been a succession of suppers, festivals, concerts and all sorts of entertainments, for the purpose of raising money for that church. Interest, pastor's salary, repairs, Sunday School supplies, etc., have appealed to that people through their ears and eyes, but principally through their stomachs. Nearly every financial effort gave rise to dissatisfaction on the part of some one. In almost every instance, some individual, or family, or class was offended. And while the village has increased three-fold in population, that church is neither numerically nor spiritually as strong as it was eight years ago, when the population was one-third what it is now. There may be other causes for its failure, but none I think so potential as the persistent attempt to do God's work in an indirect, rather than in a direct, way. And there is surely a difference here with a distinction.

Now, I speak from the standpoint of personal experience. For more than a dozen years of my early ministry, I followed the multitude in the matter of church suppers, festivals, excursions and paid entertainments; but, seeing the error of my ways, determined to set my face like flint against the whole brood. I came to the conclusion that, if properly presented to their intelligence and conscience, the people would give directly for church and benevolent work all that was necessary to be raised. Or, to reverse the proposition, that God's cause could get along without that which the people refused to give, or were unable to give directly, in response to a

Direct and Intelligent Appeal

And with one or two solitary exceptions, I managed to influence my congregations and hold them to that theory. The result was less social friction, more liberality, more intelligent consecration of individual resources to the work of the Master, larger church revenues, and incomparably greater spirituality among the members, followed by blessed revivals among the unsaved. And last, though not least, a greater reverence for God's house on the part of the young people—a consideration worth all the sacrifice required to secure it.

I may be asked, “How much ought our people to give?” I answer, there can be no hard and fast rule. There are those who, in view of health conditions, family, and limited income, should not give one-tenth of their incomes. With the masses, the tenth is a safe rule. There are many who should give two-tenths; yes, five-tenths. Others might even give all their income, and a part of their capital stock. Circumstances alter cases. While the “two mites,” given by the poor widow out of her penury, was more than the rich gave into the Lord's treasury out of their abundance, and was commented upon by the Master, I do not understand him to commend the giving of all, but rather that he would condemn the “withholding of more than is meet” on the part of the rich. To “give as the Lord hath prospered us” is our formula taken from the New Testament, and perhaps it is quite as good as any other.

Jacob's Bethel vow to give a tenth if the Lord would prosper him in the way, seemed much like a sharp bargain made with the Lord for the purpose of personal gain. But since the Lord ratified it by giving the pros-

THE DOUBLE FUNERAL IN LISBON

WITH imposing religious rites and military ceremony the bodies of the late King Carlos, of Portugal, and his eldest son, the Crown Prince, who fell by the hands of assassins, have been laid to rest in the royal tombs of Lisbon. The people were sincerely affected, and all who could afford it were dressed in mourning, others who were poorer wore black ties or gloves or a bit of crape pinned to their coats. Thousands of peasants came in from the country to Lisbon on the day of the funeral, and all classes, old animosities apparently forgotten for the time, lined the streets in the ancient city, through which the solemn procession passed. Private houses and public buildings were alike draped in black, and the national colors drooped from their halcyards at half mast. Beautiful floral tributes from all over Europe began to arrive a day or two before the funeral and were taken to the chapel where the bodies lay.

During the night, soldiers in scarlet uniforms, with the tops of their halberds pointed to the floor, and servants of the late king and prince, watched about the coffins. Some of the floral designs that surrounded them were so massive that it took several men to lift them into place. The floor was matted a foot deep with blossoms from the far-famed gardens of the rock-set castle of Cintra; roses, violets and jasmine made up this wonderful carpet.

There was an early morning service at which only the most intimate members of the household were present, and then at half-past nine the formal funeral ceremonies began. The voices of the clergy rose, chanting the litanies for the dead, and the ministers of State and officers of the household in full uniform glittering with embroidery and knightly decorations formed in procession. The palace officers went through the ceremony of recognizing the bodies, according to ancient law and usage, and then the caskets were closed and taken to the state hearses. Over each was a heavy black velvet pall embroidered with a golden cross. The king's hearse was drawn by ten horses and the prince's by eight. Officials with lighted torches walked on either side. The king's saddle horse followed King Carlos' coffin, and the favorite horse of Prince Luiz was led behind the body of his late master. Aides-de-camp followed carrying the helmets and swords of the king and prince. The master-of-ceremonies bore the royal crown of Portugal on a velvet cushion.

Lancers of the Municipal Guard led the cortege; then came the carriages of judges, councillors, members of the Senate and ambassadors from foreign countries. Next came an empty hearse, "the coach of respect," and then the royal hearses. The Royal Body Guard, officers and cavalry followed. The troops who guarded the route fell in behind, increasing the length of the procession. It took over three hours to pass a given point.

The people were packed closely from curb to wall along the street, with one exception—that was in front of the arcade where the tragedy occurred. No one seemed to wish to stand there. As the hearses passed all uncovered and the people were visibly affected, many unable to restrain their tears, especially when the hearse of the young prince passed by. He had been greatly beloved by the warm-hearted people over whom it was expected he would rule.

When the hearses arrived before the door of the Mortorio de Sao Vincente, the coffins were taken in charge by an association called the Holy House of Mercy, which has the privilege of carrying the royal coffins and making the first prayers for the dead. All of the ceremonial of centuries was used. The coffins were placed at the door of the church while the diplomats uncovered and filed past. Then the caskets were lifted by twelve bearers and taken to the interior of the church and placed on a catafalque for the religious service.

It is the beginning of this service that is illustrated. It was drawn especially for the London Sphere. The diplomatic corps sat upon two specially constructed tribunes. A requiem was celebrated, and the Patriarch gave the last absolution. Then the coffins were borne to the Pantheon, where they were to lie in state. The bells of Lisbon tolled, and the walls reverberated to the solemn boom of the minute guns of the warships.

The young King Manuel and his mother, the bereaved queen, did not attend the public funeral, as that is contrary to Portuguese custom. The king took final leave of the silent forms of the father and brother early in the morning, and as he turned away, his eyes were filled with tears.

A VISIT TO AFRICAN KINGS

great inconvenience to the travelers. There were other troubles, too; one being the failure of natives to give direct information regarding the roads; yet, in five weeks, 700 miles were covered, 500 of them on foot, at the rate of from 12 to 30 miles a day. The travelers visited 150 kraals, preached in 135, and talked to many groups of natives while passing through.

During one of his journeys in the interior, Mr. Wodehouse gives a pleasing description of a visit to a Dutch Reformed mission station at Jiris Kraal, where Mr. Jackson and his helper, Mr. Kruger, are stationed. This station has the poetical name of "Pamoshana," which means "In the sunshine." The work here is in striking contrast to that in the unevangelized kraals already mentioned.

Mr. Wodehouse writes: "We visited the school, where there were about eighty children. The average attendance is about one hundred.

"Some of the children come every day a distance of three miles. A number of little boys were quite naked except a string of beads round the neck, but it made us glad to see them being taught. How much it will mean for the future of these kraals for these children to have a knowledge of Jesus! Many are sincere little Christians. After the service, at which we all spoke, we went to dinner at the Mission House. We had prayer together after dinner. We had a service in the evening with the natives."

That there were perils even in the most peaceful sections of the African interior, however, this passage from Mrs. Louise Wodehouse's journal of travel shows:

"At the Sabi River we took off our shoes and stockings and went out into the water and sat on a rock. We kept a good lookout for crocodiles, for there are a great many in this river. On the way back we saw the print of lions' feet in the sand, where they had been down to drink. There are many hippopotami here, and we saw several traces of them. Charles brought me a tooth of a hippo which he picked up from the river. Such a huge thing! It must be dreadful to have a toothache with a tooth like that."

African scenery is full of delightful surprises. On one occasion a missionary party traveling in Basutoland stopped for breakfast in a beautiful place. They found a natural dining-room, with walls of rock on all sides and a narrow passage leading into it. It was about six feet square, while the gurgling waters of a river near by sounded like distant music in the travelers' ears.

These children of nature are logicians in a way. One chief asked Missionary Coffin to explain some strange things he had heard from Stephen, one of the missionary's native helpers. Stephen, thinking it an opportunity to exhibit his knowledge, had told him that, in the teacher's country, "it is day when it is night here." The chief did not believe him, so an animated discussion followed.

"I did not know what they were talking about," writes the missionary, "but noticed them looking at me with unusual curiosity. After a little, the old man came and asked: 'Teacher, is it day in your country when it is night here?' I attempted to explain, but the old heathen only shook his head uncomprehendingly, and turning to Stephen said: 'Teacher is as big a liar as you are.'"

Mangwendi, one of the chiefs already spoken of, and who has quite an extensive territory, has been active in several native outbreaks of the past, but is apparently reformed now. Being an old man and quite lame, the authorities as a reward for his good behavior, and in recognition of his royalty, presented him with a donkey, of which the old chief was very proud. He did not, however, become an adept equestrian, and this caused one of the boys to slyly ask "which was the donkey?" The old king was quite oblivious to the jest and paid no attention.

Usually an adult African in his native wilds and uncivilized is a rather dignified person. One native, named Mushuri, who was employed as guide and carrier, was a happy, lazy character with a powerful dislike for work, yet he did what was required of him good-naturedly. Natives venerate age, and at night, when Mushuri was told to go for water, he, greatly surprised, turned to the missionary and said: "Teacher, I have whiskers." He thought it strange that a chief with whiskers should carry water. It was beneath his dignity! He knew the country perfectly, and frequently would stop and point, saying, "Teacher, look," his quick eye having caught sight of some kind of a deer.

In the Victoria section, the missionaries were surprised to find a chief named "Johanas" teaching the Gospel to the people of his vicinity. Upon inquiry, they learned that he had become converted some time before in the Transvaal, and had felt that he must carry the message back to his own people. For months he had been among them, earnestly working, burdened for souls and hoping for help in his work. The missionaries carefully examined him, received him into the church, arranged with him to continue, and with the natives, to build a suitable chapel. Thus the first mission in that section of unevangelized Africa was opened and supplied.

On one of these missionary journeys, the travelers in the afternoon reached a Basuto settlement. Right here is a picture in vivid contrast with some that have preceded it. These Basutos came eleven years ago from the Transvaal. They paid a Dutchman $4,000 cash for the land, and they have now a nice village of square houses with windows and doors. One house had five rooms. They make their own bedsteads, tables and chairs. These houses are clean, and not lacking in ornament, having pictures on the walls and a few trinkets on shelves. One man they found building a three-roomed house of stone. The Basutos brought the visitors each a cup of coffee in china cups. These people are far in advance of the natives living around them and are an object lesson to them. One woman had twin babies, who were neatly clothed and cared for, as babies should be. The other heathen around kill twins, if any woman should be so unfortunate as to give birth to them; but the whole Basuto community seemed very proud of those twin babies. These people have a good schoolhouse and a Basuto teacher to instruct their children. A service was held for them in their schoolhouse. They came neatly dressed, and eager to hear the Word. When a missionary called for testimonies, several spoke out of a full heart.

In the African mission work there is need of buildings, native workers, schools, school books, and tools for the farm and industrial work. This applies equally to Gospel work in Rhodesia, Angola, the Congo and Liberia.

Even with the limited facilities now at their disposal, the progress made by the missionaries is more than remarkable. It is astounding. They deserve the substantial encouragement and support of good people of all denominations throughout the world.

perity, we may safely conclude that he is not averse to such vows. I know a man who, with his wife, said at their marriage, "Henceforth not less than one-tenth to the Lord's cause." And they kept their vow and were surprised again and again at the prosperity that came, enabling them to give hundreds and thousands, where they had expected to give through life only cents and dollars.

I was accustomed, prior to the year 1873, when Jay Cooke failed, and the whole country suffered, to point when attending church dedications to that financier and philanthropist as an example of systematic Christian liberality. Early in his business career, he had opened an O. P. J. account, which he explained as the "Old Patriarch Jacob Account," referring to his Bethel vow to give a tenth. After Cooke's failure, not a few of my friends came back at me with "Where now is your O. P. J. account?" I would answer, "Wait for the finis." When Jay Cooke had paid back in full to those creditors who held on to his securities, including ten per cent. interest on their holdings, I retorted on my friends by saying, "There is your O. P. J. account with interest!" It is still true that "the righteous are not forsaken, nor do their seed beg bread." Ten per cent. of the income of the millions of Christians in this country, on a careful estimate, would yield so enormous a revenue to the church annually, as to require the services of many more church officials than we now have on annual salaries of $5,000 each and expenses paid, the sum total of whose duties would be just to give this money away.

We know of no better system of church financiering than the envelope system. We worked it long before it came into general use and in a more general and systematic way, twenty-five years ago, than it is worked even now by most of our churches. I like the plan of fifty-two envelopes, one for each Sunday of the year. Similar in its details is what is known as the "duplex envelope system" issued by a Richmond, Virginia, printing-house, and now in use in many churches. One end of the partitioned envelope is for the local church, including incidentals and pastor's salary, and the other end for related benevolences. I would modify the system somewhat, but follow the general plan. This system eliminates, in a measure, the necessity laid upon the pastor for dunning from the pulpit, beginning when his pastorate begins, and ending only when the pastorate ends, unless perchance death shall mercifully relieve him before. While the caution of the Master to "do not your alms to be seen of men," and "let not one hand know what the other does," is generally applied to our method of helping the poor, yet I question whether, on interrogation, the Saviour would not have applied it with equal force to all kinds of religious, charitable and philanthropic giving. Certain it is that many of our methods for money-raising, especially at church dedications, are so ostentatious, so at variance with the spirit and character of the "meek and lowly One," so booming to the rich giver and such a boomerang to the poor giver, that we need to take heed to our ways.

We need to teach our people that giving is an act of worship, and that the daily toil that confers the ability to follow the Pauline method of giving, should be done in a worshipful spirit, whether it be farming, railroading, merchandising or housekeeping. "Whatsoever ye do, do it as unto the Lord." Then the blacksmith, as he hammers the glowing iron, will say, "At least a tenth of this product will, on Sunday next, go to enrich the treasury of my Lord." Paul wrote to the Corinthian church, "Now concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye. Upon the first day of the week, let every one of you" (that means men, women and children) "lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there may be no gatherings when I come." It would be a strange paraphrase of that language to read it thus: "Let every one of you join in getting up an oyster supper, or a charity ball, or a taffy pull, or a Boston baked beans dinner, or church theatricals, or any other thing that will raise money, only so that you have it all ready for me when I come," and further, "Oh, my Corinthian brethren, if you can induce some of the Canaanitish descendants of the Hivites, the Hittites, or the Gergashites to buy some of the tickets, this will be clear gain, and will be greatly appreciated by your servant in the Lord."

When the members of any church, large or small, have given to their full ability and have done their utmost to induce gifts from other legitimate sources and still find their expenses not met, it is a fair presumption either that the expenses should be cut down, or a padlock be put on that church door.

As another has said, "Giving to the church a portion of what one earns in his daily work, as Paul surely did, is good in every way. To ask some one else to buy the product of that work, on the plea of helping the church, does not help the buyer as much as the church ought to help him in teaching him to give." A church may get money by selling peanuts, or taffy, or oysters, or pin-cushions, or Teddy bears, but it is by that act squandering one of its finest opportunities. A church can hardly afford to lower its morals in order to raise money; better raise its morals, even if it lowers its cash balance. A church had better have high moral standards than a high steeple. There are church buildings still standing in America that were paid for with money secured by lotteries. This method was long since outlawed everywhere, except in those churches where grab-bag and fish-pond festivals still prevail. And the church fair or social entertainment as a money-getter is passing even now, as the better way begins to appear more clearly to earnest Christians and devoted supporters of church work everywhere.

A TOUR IN SOUTH INDIA

THROUGHOUT India the missionaries are pushing the campaign of the Gospel aggressively and with most encouraging results.

Small parties of missionaries will start out from a central station and will travel several hundred miles before they return.

On our recent trip up North, we passed through many towns and villages, and were impressed by the large population of India, and wondered how nearly all of them seemed to get a living of some sort, despite their numerous competitors. We were surprised to learn from our leader that about ninety per cent. of the population of India live on the land. We spent a day at Madras on our way, staying at the residence of a dear old Christian lady, Mrs. Lydia Cotelingum, who worthily fulfilled the part of her gracious namesake, who refreshed the apostles of old.

Resuming our journey to Ellore we were met by our old friend and fellow worker, Daya Seela, and his co-worker, I. D. Raju, and a band of Indian Christian workers, who received us with great joy.

Outside the railway station awaiting us was the Rajah of Bhadrachellum's own carriage, which he kindly placed at our disposal. On our arrival at the Mission House, we were greeted by more of our Christian friends: and upon entering the courtyard were agreeably surprised at the sight that met our gaze. A number of flags were fluttering in the breeze, and two handsome and artistic greetings, "God bless our Indian Christian Realm Mission" and "God bless Mr. and Mrs. Paynter," were prominently displayed.

During the day and evening, different members and friends came to pay their respects to us. After a very pleasant day we retired to rest with heartfelt thanks for the kindness we had received at the hands of the Telegu people, who are kind, polite, mild, broad-minded and agreeable in their manners and customs. On the following day we had further visits, and in the evening we paid a visit to the village of Lingaragudem, where we had a very fine meeting, there being about one hundred people present.

It was very interesting, and at the same time very touching, to see and hear many of the people who, but a short time since, were in the darkness of heathenism, singing hymns of praise and thanksgiving to God, and exhorting their unsaved fellow villagers to come to him through the Lord Jesus Christ.

After a time of singing two addresses were given—one by Mr. A. S. Paynter, the director, and the other by the writer. Both addresses were listened to attentively by the villagers. Mrs. Paynter also gave an address which particularly aroused the interest of the women of the village. After an appeal had been given to people desiring salvation to come to Christ, the meeting was brought to a close by Mr. Paynter engaging in prayer and pronouncing the benediction.

On Sunday morning about seven o'clock we returned to the village in order to baptize nine of the villagers. When we reached the village we heard the sound of singing, and on entering the compound of one of the Indians we found a number of the children of the village singing sacred hymns as lustily as only children can sing. After waiting here for a little while we adjourned for the baptismal ceremony, which was to take place a little distance out from the village, "for there was much water there." The Indian Christians sang hymns in Telegu, and after a short time of prayer and instruction, the baptismal service was proceeded with, when nine converts confessed their Lord, one of the Indian pastors carrying out the ceremony under the direction of Mr. Paynter.

We afterwards returned to the village and spent a little while conversing with the villagers.

One of the head-men of this village, an old man, named Abraham, who gave the missionaries considerable trouble when they first came to the village, was a particularly interesting case. He told with a beaming face what the Lord had done for him since he gave his heart to him, and pointed to two of the converts who had been baptized that morning, informing us that they were two of his sons. The writer particularly noticed the old man at the open-air meeting on the preceding evening. He seemed to drink in everything that was said by the various speakers.

It is not a hard matter to pick out Christians from heathen in these villages. The faces of heathen wear a dark, blank expression, and they are generally untidy in appearance, whilst the Christians have pleasant and intelligent faces, which tell of light and peace within. They are also tidy and clean in appearance, so different from the heathen villagers. A few more words of exhortation and instruction and we left these people, returning to the Mission House at Ellore, to rest and prepare for our evening service. For this service chairs and forms were procured from different places in the town, and shortly after 5 P.M. nearly every seat was occupied. Most of the people present were high-caste Hindus, Brahmans, Mohammedans, and others—many of the leading people of the town.

A splendid service had been prepared by our workers and some of their friends, and was carried out in a manner befitting any European service. Hymns were sung and short addresses given by some of the townsmen, and an ode by Narasimha Row, a local poet of repute, was read and presented to Mr. A. S. Paynter and the others. These were afterwards followed by short speeches. Mrs. Paynter sang a hymn, and then evangelical addresses were given. We believe that many hearts were touched and souls awakened as a result. The service over, a number of Brahman gentlemen who were present, some of whom are the leading officials of the town, congratulated the speakers on being especially charming. On each side of the canal lay extensive rice fields ready for the reaping, and here and there we passed groups of villagers at work gathering in the harvest, and a picturesque and interesting sight they made. They looked happy and healthy. The women are straight and graceful as those mentioned in Indian poems.

It was pleasing to notice that the children of the Christian people are cleaner, healthier, brighter and happier than those of their fellow heathen villagers.

We had a very pleasant trip across the lake, where we saw thousands of thousands of lotus flowers, from which the Buddhists say the god Parvati originated. Reeds and rushes were everywhere. When in about the middle of the lake we saw thousands upon thousands of wild duck; also flamingoes and other waterfowl.

As the sun set the lake presented a beautiful sight, and just before reaching Komati Lanka we spent the time singing some of the familiar old hymns we used to sing in the dear home land, such as "Abide With Me" and "At Even Ere the Sun Was Set." As we sang these hymns our thoughts wandered to the land where our dear ones were.

About seven o'clock we reached Komati Lanka and were met by our old veteran Indian friend and teacher, Brother Prakasam, whose energy and ability is known to all. The people go to him with anything of any consequence and he is their doctor, lawyer and spiritual adviser all in one. He was accompanied by some of his flock, who quickly transferred us and our luggage to a little mud church where we were to have our meeting, and to stay for the night.

One was amazed to find that eight months ago there was not a single Christian in this village, and now there are between sixty and seventy. At daylight we were astir again, for in India it is customary to rise early in the morning in order to escape the heat of the day at noon, when many retire for an hour's rest.

An interesting experience on the trip to Bhogapuram should be mentioned. The mud was so deep that neither horse nor bullock cart could get through it. The Rajah of Bhadrachellum lent us his elephant for the trip. Mr. Paynter was astride the elephant's back four hours. Crossing a river, the animal grew sulky, a blow from the mahout made him more angry, and he stood trumpeting for ten minutes and then moved on.

The next afternoon we made our way to Mandavelli, calling in at the Birapatam en route; Evangelist Raguniah and Teacher Isaiah meeting us with the school children, who also sang several songs of welcome to us. We resumed our journey, arriving at Mandavelli at about 7 P.M.

Our meeting at night was in the village square, and we had one of the best open-air meetings we have yet had. The sight that gladdened our hearts most here was the number of young men present who have recently become Christians. Pastor Philemon is in charge here, and is training many of the young men for future work as teachers, pastors and evangelists. The evangelization of India will mostly be done by the native workers in the future, and every inducement should be given the young men of the various missions to prepare themselves for missionary effort. In many ways the trustworthy native evangelist is superior to the European worker. He is better adapted to the climate and conditions, understands the people, knows their difficulties, and, having come from heathenism himself, is better able to point the way out than his European confrere.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST SUNDAY has just closed a revival at Bloomington, Ill., during which 1,266 persons confessed Christ.

—EVANGELIST E. R. HEEMISTON lately conducted a successful revival at Baker City, Ore. Over one hundred came forward, mostly men, and confessed Christ as Saviour.

—A GREAT REVIVAL has just closed at Ono, Wis. Fifty-one persons united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and more are coming in. The pastor, Rev. C. T. Beers, was assisted by evangelist E. D. Johnston, of Clear Lake, Wis.

—EVANGELIST W. H. VAN DEUSEN and wife, who have conducted many successful union revival meetings in the West, will be glad to help any churches now arranging for such meetings. Their address is 409 East Cherokee Street, Enid, Okla.

—EVANGELIST DAVID E. REED and George Benhard have lately conducted a twenty days' spiritual campaign at Northeast, Pa., which resulted in an old-fashioned revival. The Methodist Church was crowded nightly with large audiences. Over two hundred confessed Christ, and the spiritual life of all the churches in the place was greatly strengthened. The Baptist, Presbyterian and Evangelical churches aided in the movement.

An Open Air Gospel Service in an India Village

the success of the meeting. Some of the others present, high-caste people, promised to come and see us personally on the following day, which they did. The next day was spent in preparation for our tour in the villages in the Kolair Lake District, and in speaking to those needing a word of cheer and instruction, who came to us for that purpose.

At night we talked with three high caste young men who were anxious to become Christians. Two of these were Brahmans and the other a Vaisiya. One of the Brahmans and the Vaisiya both accepted the Lord, and both of them knelt in prayer, thanked God for what he had done for them, and testified to the joy that had come into their hearts after making their decision.

The following day we left for the Kolair Lake District. We passed through the village of Lingarowgudem, where Pastor Daniel Ebenezer and several others were waiting to give us a greeting. Proceeding a few miles further we arrived at Siripathupadu, where we transferred ourselves and luggage into the boat, as the rest of the journey to Komati Lanka, which was our next halting place, had to be done by water. Imagine our surprise when we alighted to find a number of school children with their teachers and pastor, Mr. Row, waiting to receive us. They graciously salaamed us, and then sang a pretty action song, descriptive of children's duties from morning to evening, such as saying their prayers, drawing water from the well, etc. At this place we received a petition written in Telegu and English asking us to build a church there, and also thanking us very warmly for the good the Mission was doing for their "wild children." We then left them and started on our boat journey of five hours on Kolair Lake to Komati Lanka.

It was a very beautiful and interesting trip from start to finish, the journey from the canal to the lake

The Bill to Restore the Motto

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.,

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 21.

Dr. Louis Klopsch, Editor The Christian Herald,
New York.

MY DEAR SIR: The Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures has favorably reported the McKinley bill restoring the motto, "In God We Trust," to our coinage. The bill reported is in the name of Hon. William B. McKinley, the Chairman of the Committee. Further steps toward the final passage of the measure now rest with Mr. McKinley, the Chairman of the Committee, and Hon. Joseph G. Cannon, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

It would be well to suggest to your readers that the fate of the measure now rests largely in the hands of the Speaker of the House. I am sure that, within a few days, Mr. McKinley will hold a conference with the Speaker, for the purpose of requesting permission to call up the bill from the calendar on the floor of the House. If the ministers of the district represented by Speaker Cannon would write him at once, in behalf of this measure, I am sure great good would result. All further communications regarding the matter should be sent to Hon. William B. McKinley and Hon. Joseph G. Cannon. Yours very truly,

MORRIS SHEPPARD.

Canada's Temperance Campaign

WHILE people all over this country have watched with keen interest the progress of the aggressive campaign against the saloon in our Southern and Western States, encouraging news comes from across the invisible line that separates us from our friends and neighbors in Canada, where the forces of temperance have been fighting a similar battle with almost equal success.

Recently, in the Legislature at Toronto, Hon. W. J. Hanna presented a report showing that there were now 198 licenses less than in 1906-7, and that the law is better and more strictly observed. In the city of Toronto a number of hotel men are being legally forced to give up their licenses. In 700 municipalities in the Province of Quebec there is not a single license for the sale of intoxicating liquor—a gain of 100 towns for temperance in one year. The saloon in towns where licenses still exist, it is said by the secretary of the Dominion Alliance, is becoming an unpopular institution. The success of the movement is due to the fact that temperance societies of all creeds have been working together without friction and stirred by the sole ambition to wipe out the saloon. These united societies have outlined a vigorous campaign for this year, and it looks as if at no distant day the saloon may be only a malodorous memory in the progressive Dominion.

Ill-Assorted Marriages

WHETHER the present generation be really wiser than its predecessors or not, is an open question often discussed by philosophers and sociologists. When we look around us, especially in populous neighborhoods, and note the poverty and misery that seem to increase rather than diminish with the years, the problem recurs: Are sociological conditions, after all, improving or the reverse? Are the common people to-day in better circumstances to enjoy life like reasonable beings, than were those of fifty or one hundred years ago?

Although many plans have been devised for the "abolition of poverty," it is everywhere apparent that none have thus far been successful. It was this consideration, probably, that prompted one of our readers, Miss Arbella Saddlemire, to write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a letter which appeared in these columns a few weeks ago, and which seems to have stirred up many readers to active discussion of the question whether ill-considered and early marriages are not largely responsible for poverty and suffering in very many instances. Leaving out drunkenness, extravagance and similar vices, Miss Saddlemire boldly asserts that ill-considered marriages are directly responsible for much of the poverty that exists. She urges that a law should be passed by our State legislatures forbidding young men to marry until they are twenty-five or thirty, and until they have a reasonable amount ($2,000) safely invested, and employment which brings in a sufficient income to maintain a home. She further suggests that a similar law should forbid the marriage of girls under twenty-three or twenty-five, until they have demonstrated their capacity for home-building by getting together "things to keep house with." Such a law, she declares, would "wipe out the slums in our cities."

Many will claim, no doubt, that this is a sordid view to take of the marriage relation—that it eliminates all romance and puts love and sentiment at a discount. But is it really a mercenary view? May not one have the highest appreciation of sentiment and yet be governed by common sense? Looking around at the poverty and the hopeless struggles of thousands, ay, hundreds of thousands, of couples who have taken up the cares and duties of the marriage state without due preparation, but simply on sentiment, one cannot but feel that, had there been a little consecrated common sense at the outset, many miseries might have been avoided. Surely it is not unreasonable to urge that there should be due preparation for a condition which is designed to be life-long and which, under divine blessing and with adequate human effort, should be a happy one.

There is an old proverb which says that "When poverty comes in at the door, love flies out of the window." Exemplification of this is not hard to seek. A young man on a small weekly salary, being "in love," decides to take unto himself a wife and selects some young girl with no more experience of the world than he himself possesses. With a devotion that is chivalrous in the highest degree, they decide to face the world together. How does such a pretty idyl, in many cases, work out? Will not the next turn of the vitograph be liable to show love in furnished rooms or a flat, with a hard struggle to keep up appearances on a most inadequate income; with both husband and wife out of latitude and out of sorts, becoming discouraged and wondering how it will all end? Of course, there are many young people who, fortunately, have the qualities that enable them to rise superior to their surroundings and to emerge from the mass to a condition of comparative comfort; but any one who is familiar with the life that is led in the poorer class of flats and apartments, to say nothing of tenements, knows how fierce is the battle, how hard the hill to climb that leads to success, and how difficult it is to keep the candle of love alight, when want and penury guard the threshold.

Miss Saddlemire has brought forward a topic of such universal interest that we should be pleased to have our readers discuss it, frankly and fully, in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Leaving aside the question whether such a law as she suggests is practicable, let us know what you think of the case as we have presented it, and whether it is not better that our young people should return somewhat to the older and more conservative ways of careful preparation for married life and domesticity, rather than plunge into matrimony with as little hesitation as they would go on a summer day's excursion.

The Turf Gamblers and the Law

UNDER the fundamental law of New York State, gambling is forbidden. It exists on the race-track only by a violation of that law, and this violation is accomplished by perverting the language of the statute. Right-thinking people throughout the State are now earnestly seeking to abolish race-track gambling altogether. As was to have been expected, the whole gambling fraternity, including all the big and little gamblers, and not a few men of wealth and influence who should be ashamed to be found in such company, are up in arms to prevent this reform. At Albany, we have the spectacle of the forces of good government and honest legislation on the one side, confronted by the gamblers and their allies, who include nearly all the forces of evil, on the other, and the great battle is now being fought which will decide whether the Empire State shall be given over a prey to the gamblers, or redeemed.

License evil and it is evil still. License gambling and the evils that flow from it and the crimes it promotes will remain untouched. High license or low, it is all bad. These gamblers claim that the "spirit of gentlemanly sport" and the science of "improving the breed" of horses will suffer, if they themselves are worsted. Nothing will suffer but the birds of prey, the bookmakers and their allies, the touts. As far as the horse-breeders of the country are concerned, it is incredible that they should believe turf gambling to be indispensable to the improvement of equine qualities. The greatest breeder of them all has testified that he never bet on a race in his life. He raises horses because he loves the horse, and he would not degrade it by making it a tool for the race-track gamblers.

Thus far, the battle at Albany has been waged squarely and openly, and every opportunity has been afforded both sides for a full hearing. It has been clearly shown that the claim that the farmers and agriculturists generally favor the continuance of turf betting has no foundation. A majority of the rural communities express themselves in favor of its abolition.

We have said nothing of the wider moral aspects of the question, because these are already known to every one. Turf gambling has been responsible for innumerable crimes. It has allured multitudes of young men to their ruin; has made defaulters by the thousand, and has helped to fill our jails with criminals. Governor Hughes could do no better service than to wipe out this foul blot on the Empire State. He himself has declared that race-track gambling is in direct opposition to existing law. This law should be enforced. There should be no compromise with the turf gamblers. They should be rooted out, bag and baggage.

Grace at Meals

A CORRESPONDENT recently wrote us that he had been much embarrassed by a request to say grace when a guest at a friend's table. Never having done this at home and knowing no form that suited the occasion, he was obliged to decline, and determined never again to be similarly situated. He asked for a suitable form of grace, determining to learn it and to become familiar with it by using it daily at home.

There are several simple forms of asking a blessing upon food, that fit into the need of one who desires to begin a meal by acknowledging the Giver from whom comes our daily bread. The shortest is, perhaps, "For what we are about to receive, may the Lord make us truly thankful." Another and more beautiful form is "Bless, O Lord, we beseech thee, this food to our use, and us to thy service, for Christ's sake, Amen!"

Any little extemporaneous prayer that recognizes God as the fountain of all good, is suitable in this connection. For instance, one might say, quoting the Bible, "Father, thou openest thine hand and satisfiest the desire of every living thing. We thank thee for what thou hast given us this day, and ask thee to accept us, for Christ's sake." Another and easier form is, "We ask thy blessing on this food, on this home and this day, for Christ's sake." The youngest child in the family is often taught to say grace, and it is very sweet to follow little lisping lips when a small head is bowed and dimpled hands are reverently folded.

A silent grace, when every head is bent in an attitude of prayer, is far better than no grace at all.

Sun-Worship Among Indians

HOW ancient superstitions survive even in lands in which civilization and religion are in an advanced stage, is indicated by the picture by Charles M. Russell, "the cowboy artist," which is reproduced on this page. It represents a spectacle he witnessed recently in Montana. An Indian mother of the Blackfoot tribe is holding up her babe to catch the first rays of the rising sun, that it may receive the blessing which, according to the Indian tradition, comes from the great luminary. It is not astonishing that the magnificent spectacle of the sun rising in its might, dispersing the gloom and darkness of night and bringing joy and gladness to the earth, should have inspired uneducated people to worship. Nothing more imposing comes within their experience, and its slow and majestic rising could not fail to suggest to an impressible mind the conception of the Deity. Accordingly we find among the Indians of this country and Canada, as among the Indians of Peru, who inherit the traditions of the Incas, and far away among the tribes of India, surviving to this day among the Parsees, this superstitious reverence for the symbol of light and giver of heat and fertility. Loew says that wherever he went he found among the aborigines of the various lands the same reverence. Challenging a Moqui Indian in New Mexico for the reason of his faith, he received the answer: "Why should we not worship the sun? He diffuses warmth for us and our animals and we owe to him all the comforts of life. We would be ingrates not to worship him." To which Loew adds that the Moqui was a wiser philosopher and showed a better spirit than some of his white brothers, who know more about the heavenly bodies.

Attempts have been made to trace an ethnological connection between the Indians of North America and the tribes of India, based on this common superstition, but an analysis of their varied beliefs does not support the idea. That we find sun-worship and its attendant subsidiary reverence for fire in such widely separated localities is rather due to the tendency already mentioned, natural to the untutored mind, to pay reverence to the most majestic and beneficent of natural phenomena. May the time soon come when in every land the superstition yields before that better faith:

Unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings. (Mal. 4: 2.)

Saved by a Dog

A dispatch from Louisville, Neb., reports that a young man of that city has been restored to his family through the sagacity and fidelity of his dog. In returning to his home after an excursion he fell into a dry well about two miles from the farm. He sustained severe injuries in his fall, including a broken leg and the fracture of two ribs. He was unable to move, and his cries were not heard by the few people who came near the well. Two days and nights passed, and he began to think he would die of starvation, when at last rescue came through his dog. After he fell into the well the dog went home, where, after barking and whining, he set off again for the well. He continued this until they followed him thither and drew his master to the surface. It would be well if Christians were as much in earnest as this dog in trying to save those who have fallen on life's journey and are helpless to save themselves. They have better reason than he for their efforts, for Christ is ever ready to go to the rescue when his help is sought.

And Jesus, seeing their faith, said unto the sick of the palsy, Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee. (Matt. 9: 2.)

To Bring the Dead to Life

A paper recently presented at a meeting of the French Biological Society by Dr. L. B. Robinovitch has caused a sensation. The author, who is a lady physician, made the startling claim that she has discovered a method of restoring to life persons who have been killed by electricity. Her method is to give the patient a series of rhythmic electrical impulses, thus re-establishing respiration and cardiac reaction and restoring sensibility. The same treatment has been successfully applied where the subject had been suffering from a syncope produced by chloroform. She proposes to come to New York and obtain permission to try her remedy on the next murderer electrocuted in prison. If she obtains permission and succeeds in restoring an executed murderer, the courts would be puzzled about his standing. He might demand to be set free, having submitted once to the punishment prescribed. It is such a condition that the apostle uses to typify the change that occurs in the standing of one who has appropriated the great Sacrifice.

The death that he died he died unto sin once, but the life that he liveth he liveth unto God. (Rom. 6: 10.)

Amateur Church-Builders

A church is being finished in novel fashion in Kansas City, according to a report in the Times of that city. It states that a Baptist congregation, which has outgrown the frame building it has hitherto occupied, decided to erect a more commodious edifice. The people, however, are not wealthy, and through unforeseen circumstances, the funds were exhausted before the church was finished.

A meeting was called to consider finances. Finally the pastor suggested that the people themselves should do the work. There was no difficulty about obtaining materials and he proposed that each member should contribute his labor. The proposal was cheerfully adopted. The Times gives this report of progress: "Every day and many nights, under the direction of some of the members who are carpenters, the work goes on. Those who cannot work by day give their time at night." That church when it is finished will be very dear to the men who have labored on it. Men treasure most that which has cost them a sacrifice of some kind. The living church is represented as being dear to Christ himself for the same reason.

Even as Christ also loved the church and gave himself for it . . . that he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing. (Eph. 5: 25, 27.)

Refusal to Fire at the Flags

A change has been made in the arrangements for a sham battle, which is planned to take place near Fort Worth, Tex., owing to the loyal sentiments of one of the armies. The parties to the mimic combat are on the one side the Texas national guardsmen, and on the other an organization still maintained, called the Confederate Guard of Dallas, which did effective service on the Southern side during the Civil War. At the final meeting of the committee of arrangements, the captain of the Confederate Guard announced that his command would not participate if the militiamen used the American flag. "Under no circumstances will we fire on the Stars and Stripes, not even in a sham battle," declared the captain. "We stopped doing that in 1865." Rather than have the sham battle abandoned, the managers of the event decided to have the national guardsmen use some other set of colors. Firing on the Stars and Stripes even in play was repugnant to an organization which had experienced the consequences of firing on them seriously. They were more careful about their conduct not being misunderstood than those Christians are who fail in reverence for the Bible. Jokes and puns on Bible passages are shocking when they are uttered by Christians who should hold God's Word in too much reverence to use it to point a witticism.

Be more ready to hear than to give the sacrifice of fools; for they consider not that they do evil. (Eccles. 5: 1.)

Resisting Rescue

A narrow escape from a terrible death occurred recently in Brooklyn, N. Y. A girl fourteen years old was awakened about midnight by the roar of flames in the store kept by her mother, in the rear of which she was sleeping. She sprang out of bed and rushed to an adjoining room in which her two brothers slept, then to her mother's room, in which were two sisters beside her mother. Each sleeper snatched what garments were at hand and ran for safety. The mother was leaving the burning house when, to her horror, she saw the girl who had aroused them all standing as if dazed in the path of the flames. She called to the child, but the girl had begun screaming in frenzy and made no attempt to escape. The mother seized a blanket and throwing it over the girl tried to carry her out. But the girl had lost her mind and fought desperately. The mother was weak, and, having carried the girl toward an open door, fell in a faint. This seemed to restore the child to reason, for seizing her mother by the feet she dragged her into the open air, and in saving her mother, saved herself. Many a mother has had a similar struggle in trying to save a beloved child from an infinitely worse fate. The spell of temptation and sin seems to temporarily suspend the use of reason.

The god of this world hath blinded the eyes of them that believe not. (II. Cor. 4: 4.)

Murderous Bills

There was a hurried funeral in New York recently. The superintendent of one of the Mills Hotels in the city died after a short illness and was buried the following day. The physician who attended him said he had died of malignant scarlatina, a disease that is rare among adults. There was no doubt in the doctor's mind that he had contracted it in handling the currency brought in by some of the lodgers from the slums. He was the treasurer of the hotel as well as its superintendent, and in that capacity had to handle thousands of bills. The doctor recognized the critical nature of the disease as soon as he was called in, and advised consultation with another physician. The other doctor confirmed the diagnosis and both did their utmost to save the patient, but he died in spite of their efforts. One wonders what became of those bills and whether they are now carrying their infection to other holders. We are told sometimes that there cannot be tainted money, but this incident shows that there is a sense in which it can bear a very deadly taint. People understood that, and if those bills could be identified, no one would touch them, however badly he needed them. He would be considered foolish who accepted them, even as a gift, yet men are considered wise who strive to gain money that bears a more deadly moral taint, being unjustly obtained.

As the partridge sitteth on eggs and hatcheth them not, so he that getteth riches and not by right shall leave them in the midst of his days and at his end shall be a fool. (Jer. 17: 11.)

THE STORY OF A CHRISTIAN HERO

General O. O. Howard's Remarkable Career in War and Peace—Army Reminiscences

THERE is not a dull chapter in the two ample volumes of General Howard's autobiography.* Of course, each chapter is not of equal interest to every reader. One veteran general of the Civil War, who lost an eye in a battle charge which he gallantly led, said to the writer that he "read with deep interest every word." Another speaks of the account of the seven years' administration of freedmen's affairs as an invaluable contribution to history, because of the great importance of that attempt of the nation to start the emancipated race aright and the fact that no adequate history of that period of reconstruction has ever been written.

There is much that is of thrilling interest to any patriotic reader, and especially one who has sympathy for the oppressed race, in the description of the conditions of the freedmen and refugees in 1865-66, and later, in the legislation to assure them their rights as men and citizens, in their inevitable sufferings, whether from hunger, want of proper shelter, sickness and all the concomitants of poverty (for emancipation brought them no possessions but freedom), or from the cruelty in some sections, of their former owners and those who resented any attempts to build up the manhood or womanhood of the ex-slaves.

On Behalf of the Emancipated Race

Few philanthropic people can read the chapter on the Ku Klux Klan without having their hearts stirred with sympathy for the hunted freedmen and their families and appreciation of the noble teachers, women as well as men, who were willing to undergo social ostracism in the South and live in deprivation of many of the common comforts of life for the sake of giving instruction and help in practical Christian living to the freed people and their children. The narrative depicts this great educational work in its beginnings and records how the foundations were laid for such institutions as the Hampton Institute, Virginia, and of Fisk, Atlanta, Tougaloo and Straight Universities, situated in different Southern States, and of Howard University at Washington, D.C. If any one desired to test

Gen. Oliver Otis Howard

the practical wisdom of the head of the Freedmen's Bureau he would only need to turn to these chapters, which tell of the numbers of teachers and Christian leaders for their people which have been turned out from year to year, during forty years, from these and other similar institutions. Some twenty-six of them are briefly sketched. "There has been no cessation of demand for trained colored youth," writes General Howard, "and no diminution of interest on the part of the descendants of the freedmen in seeking for that knowledge which will fit them for the common duties of life. To show how great things spring from small in this matter, notice the work of a single graduate of Hampton, Booker T. Washington." The wonderful growth of Tuskegee is indicated from the small beginning in a colored church till it has reached an enrolment of 1,624 students in 1907, and has received into its treasury in thirteen years $491,955.42 in cash.

The Boy Father to the Man

The part of the first volume devoted to boyhood, to college and West Point life, will seem all too brief to the younger readers and those who are fond of tracing the elements of promise in a youth who afterwards has a distinguished career. By reason of the death of his father when he was only nine years of age, the oldest of three brothers, he was early made to feel the responsibilities of a comforter and helper to his mother. Work on the home farm gave him an appreciation of labor and a sympathy for the laborer which he has always evinced. To supplement the meagre three months in a year of a country school, he worked for his board and attended a high school at Hallowell, Me. His mother, ambitious that he should have a collegiate course, denied herself luxuries and practised the New England economy, and young Howard, at Bowdoin College, spent his winter vacations in teaching district schools to add to the necessary funds.

Gen. Howard, Commander Dept. of the East, 1888

At West Point, although he had warm friends among the cadets from Southern States, he was immediately brought to feel that he had come into an atmosphere where his early democratic feelings and habits were unpopular. Sometimes already, in 1850, discussions of the slavery question brought slurs and insults for a fearless Northern opponent of slavery, and Cadet Howard received a cut in the head which was doubtless the first blood shed by him in the cause of human freedom.

Courage as a Christian

Lieutenant Howard's first campaigning was in the Florida Seminole War. Perhaps no part of his life will interest earnest Christian people more than this. He dates his conversion at this period, and gives a simple, frank account of his study of the Bible, his reading of the life of Captain Vicers of the British Army—a deeply religious character—and the way light and peace came to himself one night in his little office in Tampa. Soon after, while he was sitting one evening in a Methodist church and the minister was inviting people to come forward to the altar, an incident occurred which illustrates that courage can be tested in other ways than on the battlefield. In the words of the narrative:

Quite a number arose and worked their way to the front; among them was a poor hunchback woman whose gait in walking was very peculiar. I noticed some young men on the other side of the church, that I knew, laughing at her grotesque appearance. I asked myself, "Which would you rather be, on the side of those who are trying to do God's will or on the side of the scoffers?" I instantly rose and went to the front and knelt at the altar. Mr. Lynde, in tears, put his hands upon my head and prayed for me. I was not conscious of any particular change in myself, but I had taken the public stand, which caused quite a sensation in our garison. Some of the officers said that I had disgraced the uniform of others, that I was half crazy; but a few sympathized with me, and were my friends then, and, in fact, ever after.
